Co'chin China, a name formerly borne by a province of the old kingdom of Annam, extending along its E. coast to the S. of Tongking. The designation was frequently applied to the whole kingdom of Annam. See COCHIN CHINA, FRENCH.

Cochin China, French, or Lower Cochin China (Fr. Basses Cochins-Chine, bàs ko'shâm'-sheen'), or simply Cochin China, a French possession in the SE. corner of Asia, included in the general government of French Indo-China. It is bounded on the N. by Cambodia and Annam, on the SE. by the South China Sea, and on the W. by the Gulf of Siam. It projects southward as a peninsula, terminating in Cape Camao (or Cambodia), in lat. 8° 35' N. The northern limit is about lat. 11° 40'. Area, about 22,000 sq. m. Off the SE. coast is the island of Condor (Pulo Condor). Lower Cochin China is in the main a broad, low-lying alluvial plain, and includes the extensive delta of the Mekong. A great part of the coast-region is a swampy tract, and cane-covered marsh-lands stretch far into the interior. Towards the NE. the land rises, and near the extreme N. the mountains reach an elevation of nearly 3000 feet. In the regions removed from the coast there are tropical forests of considerable extent, which abound in the wild beasts characteristic of India. The deposits of the Mekong and other rivers have produced a soil of exuberant fertility. There is a rainy season, corresponding to the summer of more northerly regions, the average annual rainfall being about twice that of the eastern United States. The climate is unhealthy for Europeans. The soil yields bountiful crops of rice, which is the chief food of the people and is exported in great quantities. The sugar-cane grows luxuriantly and appears to be indigenous. Cotton and tobacco are extensively raised and the culture of coffee is steadily advancing. Among other products are beans, maize, peanuts, coconuts, pepper, cardamoms, indigo, mulberries, areka-nuts, and bananas. Among domestic animals the buffalo occupies the first place. The population of Cochin China in 1901 was 968,500. About nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Annamese. There are about 200,000 Cambodians and between 75,000 and 100,000 Chinese. There is a sprinkling of Moïs, Malays, Europeans, and others. Buddhism is the prevailing religion. The Roman Catholics number about 75,000. The French have established several hundred schools, which are conducted mainly by native teachers. The exports of Cochin China include rice, dried fish, pepper, buffalo-hides, cardamoms, copra, cotton, isinglass, and silk. The bulk of the trade, which is mainly in the hands of the Chinese, passes through Saigon. Cochin China is administered by a lieutenant-governor and Saigon is the seat of government. Other considerable places are Cholon, Bien-hoa, Mi-tho (My-tho), Vinh-long, Long-xuyen, Bac-lien, Chau-doc, Ben-tre, Soc-trang, and Tay-ninh. The various portions of Lower Cochin China have come under French dominion at successive times since 1863.

Colmar, a post-village of Montgomery co., Pa., on the Philadelphia and Reading R., 25 miles N. of Philadelphia. Pop. 200.

Colmars, kol'mar' (L. Col'lis Mar'tia,—i.e., "Mars' Hill"), a small town of France, in Basses-Alpes, 24 miles N. of Castellane, on the Verdon.

Colmamar, kol-má-nar', a town of Spain, province and 15 miles N. of Malaga. Pop. (commune) about 4000.

Colmenar de Oreja, kol-má-nar' dá o-rá-ná, a town of Spain, 30 miles SSE. of Madrid. Pop. (commune) about 6600.

Colmenar Viejo, kol-má-nar' ve-á-ño, a town of Spain, 17 miles N. of Madrid. Pop. (commune) about 5000.

Colmesneil, kól'me-neel', a post-village of Tyler co., Tex., on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas and the Southern Pacific Rrs., 9 miles N. of Woodville. Pop. about 375.

Colme, kôln or kôn, a river of England, co. of Hertford, Buckingham, and Middlesex, which joins the Thames near Staines.

Colme, a river of England, co. of Essex, empties into the North Sea N. of the Blackwater.

Colme, kôln, a municipal borough of England, co. of Lancaster, on an affluent of the Calder and on the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, 26 miles N. by E. of Manchester. It has manufactures of textiles. Pop. in 1901, 23,000.

Colney Hatch, in the co. of Middlesex, England, about 7 miles NNW. of the center of London, has a large asylum for the insane.

Colo, a banking post-town of Story co., Iowa, on the Chicago and Northwestern R., 22 miles W. of Marshalltown. Pop. in 1900, 391.

Cologna, ko-lôn'yá, a town of Italy, 19 miles SE. of Verona. Pop. about 2800; of the commune, in 1901, 8318.

Cologne, ko-lôn' (Fr. pron. kol'lôn'; Ger. Cöln or Köln, kôln; anc. Op'pidum (or Ch'ltas) Ubi'rum; later, Colonia Agrippina and Colonia Ulpia Agrippinensis), a city of Prussia, in the Rhine Province, capital of the administrative district of Cologne, on the W. bank of the Rhine, 45 miles NNW. of Coblenz, and at an elevation of 120 feet above the sea. It is at the junction of several railways, and is opposite to Deutz, to which two bridges extend. Its great cathedral, begun in 1248 and completed in 1880, one of the finest Gothic buildings in the world, is the chief object of interest. It measures 148 yards in length and in height (the western towers) 512 feet. The city is a fortress of the first class and is the seat of a large trade. Besides the cave de Cologne, which takes its name from the place, it manufactures a great variety of articles, sugar, tobacco, glue, furniture, pianos, machines, chemicals, etc. Cologne was a town of some importance even before the Roman conquest, and many of its buildings are of great historical interest. The narrow and crooked streets of the old city and their quaint and irregular architecture give it more of the medieval character than most German cities possess. A new city has been built up around these ancient quarters since 1881, and the encircling Ring-Strasse, 3½ miles long, is a magnificent series of boulevards. Among the structures and edifices of general interest are the Rathaus, the municipal museum, the court of justice, post-office, imperial bank, the monument to Frederick William III. (erected in 1878), the church of St. Gereon, etc. Cologne possesses a municipal library of 180,000 volumes, rich in incunabula, a splendid zoological garden, and several museums. Pop. in 1880, 144,772; in 1890, 232,537; in 1900, 372,220. The archbishops of Cologne ranked among the great princes of the old German Empire and held the position of imperial electors. The see was secularized in the course of the Napoleonic wars, and the Congress of Vienna assigned the old electoral territories to Prussia. In 1824 the dignity of archbishop of Cologne was revived. In the latter part of the Middle Ages the burghers of Cologne succeeded, after bloody struggles, in emancipating themselves from the rule of the archbishops, who established their residence at Bonn. The town became one of the most important members of the Hanseatic League and one of the most populous cities of Europe. After centuries of decline Cologne again rose to great importance in the nineteenth century.

Cologne, kol'loñ', a small town of France, in Gers, 18 miles N. of Lombes.

Cologne, ko-lôn', a post-village of Carver co., Minn., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R., 9 miles W. of Chaska. Pop. in 1900, 238.

Cologno, ko-lôn'yo, a town of Italy, in Lombardy, 8 miles SSE. of Bergamo. Pop. about 2500.

Coloma, a post-village of Cherokee co., Ala., about 10 miles SE. of Center.

Coloma, a post-village of Eldorado co., Cal., on the South Fork of the American River, about 44 miles ENE. of Sacramento. Gold has been found here.

Coloma, a post-village of Parke co., Ind., 4 miles W. of Rockville. Pop. about 200.

Coloma, a banking post-village of Berrien co., Mich., on the Pawpaw River and on the Pere Marquette R., 9 miles NE. of Benton Harbor. Pop. in 1900, 687.

Coloma, a post-village of Carroll co., Mo., 15 miles N. of Carrollton. Pop. 125.

Coloma, a post-village of Deerlodge co., Mont. Pop. 75.

Coloma, a post-hamlet of Waushara co., Wis., 50 miles W. of Oshkosh. Pop. 75.

Coloma Station, a post-village of Waushara co., Wis., on the Wisconsin Central R., 35 miles S. of Stevens Point. Pop. 250.

Colombes, kol'lomb', a town of France, department of Seine, 6 miles by rail NW. of Paris. It has petroleum refineries, manufactures of starch, gelatin, woollens, etc. Pop. in 1901, 22,697.

Colombia, a federal republic of South America, occupying the northwesternmost portion of that continent, and bounded on the N. by the Caribbean Sea, on the E. by Venezuela, S. and SE. by Ecuador, by disputed territory claimed to extend to Peru (lon. 70°-73° W.), and by Brazil, and W. by the Pacific Ocean and the republic of Panama.

Its most northerly point is Punta Gallinas, of the Goajira peninsula, about lat.  $12^{\circ} 24' N.$ , southward the country, in its fullest outline, extends to the valley of the Amazon, to lat.  $4^{\circ} 30' S.$  The isthmian extension of Panama, abutting westward upon Costa Rica, and until 1903 extending the boundaries of the main-land through nearly 7 degrees of longitude, or upward of 400 miles, constitutes almost wholly the new republic of Panama. Colombia is divided into eight departments, which, with their capitals, are as follows:

Departments.	Capitals.	Departments.	Capitals.
Antioquia.....	Medellin.	Cundinamarca.	Bogotá.
Bolívar.....	Cartagena.	Magdalena....	Santa Marta.
Boyacá.....	Tunja.	Santander.....	Bucaramanga.
Cauca.....	Popayán.	Tolima.....	Ibagué.

The population estimated for 1895 was about 4,000,000, which included about 150,000 wild Indians.

Relief of the Land.—Colombia may be properly divided into two main physiographic regions,—that of lowlands (savannas, llanos, selvas or forested tracts) in the E. and S.E. and that of mountains and plateaus in the centre and W. Three main mountain-chains traverse the republic from S. to N. and are a part of, or are linked to, the great Andean system: the western range, or Cordillera de Chocho, which rises in the Cerro Torre to upward of 12,000 feet elevation; the central range, or Cordillera de Quindío,—so named from the famous Quindío Pass, which crosses its central portion,—which is a direct continuation of the Eastern Cordillera of Ecuador, and like it is composed largely of ancient schistose and granitic rocks; and the eastern range, or Cordillera de Bogotá or Summa Pas, which seems to stand in the same relation to the main Andes that the Jura Mountains do to the Alps. It is largely constructed of comparatively new (Cretaceous, etc.) sediments and is entirely free of volcanoes. Near the Occu-Pamplona bifurcation, where is situated the Cocui Peak, its highest elevation (about 16,000 feet), it sends off one branch eastward into Venezuela (to unite with the Sierra de Mérida), and another, the Sierra de Perijá, to continue as the backbone of the Goajira peninsula. The central range is studded with volcanoes, active or semi-active and extinct, and carries the loftiest summits of the land (Tolima, in partial eruption as late as 1829, 18,400 ft.; Herveo, 18,350 ft.; Huila, 18,000 ft.; Santa Isabel, 16,760 ft.; Ruiz, 17,400 ft.). This chain flattens out northward into the plains of Antioquia, Bolívar, and Magdalena, but seems to have a direct constructive continuation in the magnificent isolated mass of the Santa Marta, which abuts abruptly upon the Caribbean Sea, and rises to an altitude of nearly or quite 18,000 ft. The three Colombian mountain-systems converge near the Ecuadorian frontier in the “knot of Pasto.” It would appear that the low mountain axis of the isthmian extension, which was depressed beneath the sea in Middle Tertiary times, bears only a secondary relation to the true Andes, which properly terminate on the eastern side of the Atrato depression. See PANAMA.

Rivers.—The main streams of Colombia are the Magdalena, whose course is largely directed between the eastern and central mountain-ranges; the Ganeca, its main tributary, flowing between the central and western ranges; the Atrato, pursuing a nearly parallel course, but one lying west of the Andes proper, and which defines a depression extending almost continuously from the Gulf of Darien or Urabá, on the Atlantic side, to Chirambira on the Pacific; the Meta, Guaviare, and Vichada, tributaries of the Orinoco; and the Negro (Ucayari) and Japurá (Caquetá), important affluents of the Amazon. There are no streams of any magnitude discharging into the Pacific Ocean. The Magdalena is geographically and commercially the most important river of the republic, and is usually ranked, in length and volume of water, as the fourth river of the continent, being surpassed only by the Amazon, Orinoco, and Paraná. It has a course, including its windings, of over 1000 miles, and is navigable, except for a single break of 20 miles,—the rapids of Honda, 600 miles above its mouth,—for nearly 850 miles. (See MAGDALENA, CAUCA, ATRATO, etc.) There are no large lakes in the republic, but a great lacustrine sea appears at one time to have occupied much of the plateau of Cundinamarca.

The climate of Colombia varies with the elevation. The coast-land and low plains are in general hot and frequently malarial; but the high table-lands have often a genial climate, the perpetual spring of Bogotá being especially fine. Here every product of the temperate zones grows to perfection. The mean annual temperature is about  $57^{\circ}$ , with 40–45 inches of rainfall. In the deep river-valleys and on the llanos a mean of  $85^{\circ}$  or more is maintained, and the temperature not rarely rises to  $105^{\circ}$ . The rainfall over parts of the Atlantic-Pacific lowlands is very high, as much in some places as 150–200 inches.

Resources.—The mineral wealth of Colombia is great. Considerable gold is produced, largely from placer deposits, although much vein- and reef-ore has latterly been obtained. Rich ores of silver are known to be abundant, and a few of them are exploited to some degree. Emeralds of unusually fine quality are found in the state of Boyacá. Salt and coal are plentiful, and platinum, copper, mercury, and several other metals are found at different points. The annual output of gold and silver is about $4,500,000 in value. The salt-mines of Zipaquirá, near Bogotá, supply nearly the whole country with salt. Petroleum is found in several of the departments. Among the native vegetable products are many fine timber trees, the wax-palm, cacao, india-rubber, bamboo, ipecac, calisaya bark, divi-divi, balsam of tolt, vegetable ivory, cochineal, sarsaparilla, logwood, fustic, archil, etc. These, with rice, mother-of-pearl, cotton, indigo, tobacco, coffee, sugar, bananas, hides, gold-dust, ores, deer-skins, and “Panama” hats, are leading articles of export,—the last commodity being extensively prepared from the fibre called jipijapa, the product of a native palm-like tree, the Carludovicia.

Wheat, maize, and barley thrive in the temperate high-land. Only a small section of the country is under cultivation. A bleak, almost uncultivable and uninhabited zone, known as that of the páramos, follows the limits of arboreal vegetation on the mountains from a height of about 10,000 to 13,000 feet. In the deep forest tracts the vegetation is extremely luxuriant. Among the native animals are the puma, jaguar, bear, deer, armadillo, ant-eater, sloth, ovy, opossum, tapir, many kinds of monkeys, the condor, parrots, humming-birds, etc. The manatee is found in the Atrato and Magdalena rivers.

Several lines of railway are planned to connect the principal cities, the aggregate length in operation being, in 1901, 411 miles, with others in course of construction. The foreign trade is now chiefly carried on at Barranquilla, Sabanilla, Rio Hacha, Cartagena, Santa Marta, Buenaventura, and Tumaco. Numerous steamboats are employed upon the Magdalena, and some development has been made of steam-navigation on the Amazon tributaries.

The government consists of a president, elected for six years, a senate of 24 members (3 from each department), and a house of representatives (1 for each 50,000 inhabitants), elected by universal suffrage. The governors of the departments are nominated by the president. The Spanish language is universal, except among the Indians. Compulsory education is required by law. The principal towns are Bogotá (the capital, with about 120,000 inhabitants), Medellín (50,000), Cartagena, Bucaramanga, Ibagué, and Popayán.

In the colonial period Colombia was a part of the Spanish viceroyalty of New Granada, in which Venezuela was also for a time included. The movement for the liberation of the country from the yoke of Spain was inaugurated in 1810. While the struggle was in progress Bolívar founded, in 1819, a republic of Colombia, which embraced New Granada and Venezuela. In 1821 he triumphed over the Spaniards, and soon after the province of Quito (Ecuador) was freed from Spanish rule and annexed. The union was dissolved in 1829–30, and thenceforth there were three separate republics. The country under consideration was called New Granada (and later the Granadine Confederation) from 1831 to 1861, then the United States of Colombia until 1886, when a new constitution was adopted and the official name of the state changed to La República de Colombia. In 1903 the department of Panama, having a population of about 285,000, seceded from the republic. The present population consists in principal part of mestizos, and includes about 350,000 pure whites, 300,000 negroes and mulattoes, and 150,000 uncivilized Indians.

Colombier, ko'lon-be-á, a village of Switzerland, canton and 4 miles SW. of Neuchâtel.

Colombo, or Columbo, the principal seaport town and the modern capital of Ceylon, on its W. coast, in lat.  $6^{\circ} 56' N.$ , lon.  $79^{\circ} 49' E.$  It consists of the European city and of the native quarter, between which is a citadel built by the Dutch. The harbor, originally very poor, has been much improved by a great breakwater. Colombo has a very extensive trade, and is a landing-place for many English and other lines of steamers. Railway lines proceed hence into the interior of the island. The town is artificially supplied with water brought from a distance of 30 miles. The inhabitants comprise, in addition to the Sinhalese, a number of Parsees, Jews, Tamils, and Malays, and a mixed population of Portuguese, Dutch, and English descent. Colombo is the seat of an Anglican and of a Catholic bishop. It has a museum and a branch of the Asiatic Society. The Portuguese established themselves here in 1617, and in 1656 were dispossessed by the Dutch, who were succeeded by the English in 1796. Pop. in 1901, 158,093.

Colom, a banking post-village of St. Joseph co., Mich., on the St. Joseph River and on the Michigan Central R., 6 miles E. of Canterville. It has various manufacturing industries and is a shipping point for agricultural produce. Pop. about 880.

Colom, a post-village of Saunders co., Neb., 6 miles by rail N. of Wahoo. Pop. in 1906, 193.

Colón, a town of Cuba, province of Matanzas, 40 miles by rail SE. of Cardenas. Pop. in 1899, 7175. It is in a sugar region.

Colón, formerly Aspinwall, a seaport of the republic of Panama, on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus of Panama, 47 miles by rail from Panama (and forming one of the termini of the railroad, opened in 1855). It has a capacious harbor and is in regular steamship communication with the chief Atlantic ports of the world. It acquired considerable importance at the time work was in progress on the Panama Canal. Pop. about 4500.

Colón, a town of the Argentine Republic, in the province of Entre Ríos, and on the Uruguay River, which is here navigable for large craft.

Colón, a department in the NE. part of Honduras. The Caribbean Sea and the Segovia River form the N. and E. boundaries, and the Cuero River the W. The western part is mountainous, and the eastern has fertile plains well adapted to agriculture and stock-raising. Capital, Trujillo. Pop. in 1887, 11,474.

Colón, a territory of Venezuela, comprising the islands Oruña, Los Roques and Aves, in the Caribbean Sea. Pop. about 140.

Colona, or Colona Station, a post-village of Henry co., Ill., on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. and the Burlington Route, 12 miles E. of Rock Island.

Colona di Bariano, ko-lo-ná dee boo-re-á/no, a village of Italy, in Tuscany, 8 miles NE. of Castiglione della Pescaia, remarkable for the remains of cyclopean walls and for Roman and Etruscan antiquities.

Colonges, ko-lónsh', a village of Vaud, Switzerland, on Lake Geneva, forming part of greater Montreux.

Colonia, ko-lo-né-á, a department in the SW. part of Uruguay, along the lower Uruguay River and the Rio de la Plata. Area, 2192 sq. m. The soil is fertile and well watered. Capital, Colonia. Pop. in 1900, 50,275.

Colonia, a maritime town of Uruguay, on the N. bank of the estuary of the Plata, opposite Buenos Aires, 98 miles WNW. of Montevideo. Pop. about 3000.

Colonia, or Colonia Agrippina. See COLOSNA.

Colonia Juárez, a colony of Mexico, in the state of Chihuahua and district of Bravos.

Colonial Beach, a post-town and summer-resort of Westmoreland co., Va., 76 miles S. of Washington, D.C. Pop. in 1900, 453.

Colonia Patricia, an ancient name of Compoa.

Colonna (ko-lón'ná), Cape (It. "column;" anc. Sar-nium Promontorium), the most southern point of Attica, Greece. Lat. 37° 38' 33" N.; lon. 24° 1' 45" E. Its summit is crowned by the ruins of a temple, 260 feet above the sea, of which a number of columns are still standing, whence the name of the cape.

Colonne (ko-lón'ná), Cape (anc. Laecium Promontorium), a headland of Calabria, Italy, projecting into the Ionian Sea, 6 miles SE. of Otrone.

Colonsay, an island of the Hebrides, in Argyllshire, Scotland, 9 miles WNW. of Islay. Area, about 16 sq. m. Close to it is the little island of Oronsay.

Colony, a banking post-city of Anderson co., Kan., 16 miles by rail S. by W. of Garnett. Pop. in 1900, 483.

Colony, a post-village of Knox co., Mo., on the Middle Farnis, 33 miles WSW. of Keokuk, Iowa.

Colony, a post-hamlet of Washita co., Okla., about 14 miles S. of Weatherford.

Colony, a post-village of Fayette co., Tex., about 8 miles from Flatonia.

Colophon (Gr. Κολοφών), an ancient Ionian city on the coast of Asia Minor, NW. of Ephesus.

Colo'ra, a post-village of Cecil co., Md., on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore R., 63 miles WSW. of Philadelphia. Pop. 250.

Colorado, ko-lo-rah'do, a west-central state of the American Union, traversed by the Rocky Mountains. It is bounded N. by Wyoming and Nebraska, E. by Nebraska and Kansas, S. by Oklahoma and New Mexico, and W. by Utah. The 37th and 41st parallels of N. latitude and the meridians of the 102d and 109th degrees of W. longitude enclose the state. Area, 103,925 (land-surface, 103,645) sq. m. In the order of its admission to the Union it is the thirty-eighth state.

Surface of the Country.—Colorado is broadly divided into two clearly-defined physiographic areas: the plains in the E. and the mountains in the W., the latter, as the main mass of the Rocky Mountains, traversing the state in several more or less distinct ranges from south to north. The more important of these ranges are the Front Range, in the east, and, following westward, the Park and Saguache or Sawatch ranges; and, as almost direct continuations, the Medicine Bow Mountains in the N. and the Culebra and Sangre de Cristo mountains in the S. Other mountain elevations are the Uncompaghere and San Juan mountains in the SW. and the Elk and White River mountains in the W. Among the loftiest summits of the state are Pike's Peak (14,108 feet) and Long's Peak (14,371 ft.), two of the most famous mountains of the Front Range; Gray's Peak, 14,341 ft.; Mount Lincoln, in the Park Range, 14,297 ft.; Mountain of the Holy Cross, 14,006 ft.; Mount Harvard, 14,375 ft.; Mount Princeton, 14,196 ft.; Mount Yale, 14,187 ft.; and Uncompaghere Peak, 14,239 ft. Blanca Peak, in the Sangre de Cristo Mountains, 14,390 or 14,465 ft., is the loftiest summit in the state, and, with the possible exception of Mount Whitney, of the Sierra Nevada of California, and the volcanic cones of Rainier and Shasta, the most elevated mountain of the United States outside of Alaska. The isolated Spanish Peaks in the S. are volcanic and rise to 13,620 ft. Elevated passes, some of the loftiest of which are traversed by railroads, unite the inner basins and give access to the interior. Such are the Hagerman Pass (11,530 ft.), on the "Continental Divide," near Leadville, the most elevated railroad pass across the Rocky Mountains; the Marshall Pass, 10,858 ft.; and the Veta Pass, 9390 ft. A cog-railroad ascends to the summit of Pike's Peak.

Owing to the deficiency of precipitation in the state, the mountains carry a very high snow-line, and many of the loftiest summits, such as Pike's Peak, are almost entirely free of snow during the summer. Hence, there are hardly any ice-fields that are worthy of the name of glacier (Hallett Glacier). Few of the peaks have a strictly Alpine character.

The mountain-chains enclose a series of remarkable valleys, known as parks, often containing small lakes, which occupy the place of larger ones that gave the lacustrine or basin-like character to the parks themselves. The parks are generally small, but some are larger than some entire states of the Union. The best known of the great parks are the North, Middle, South (between the Front and Park Ranges), Las Animas, and San Luis parks. Notwithstanding their great elevation, most of the parks are fertile, well timbered, and have a mild climate, and the remarkable height of their mountain-walls gives them a strikingly characteristic magnificence of scenery.

The extreme west of the state is largely in the form of lofty plateaus, with steeply-exposed scarps and with horizontal or nearly horizontal strata extending over long distances. Parts of this vast uplift are seen in the Uncompaghere Plateau and the singularly variegated Book Cliff Plateau. The great plains that lie east of the mountains have plateau characteristics, since they rise to nearly 6000 feet where they abut against the great mountain-wall (as at Colorado Springs). Their fall is steady towards the Mississippi Valley. There can be no doubt that they represent the floor of an ancient (Cretaceous) sea, but the surface is largely masked by lacustrine deposits.

The principal rivers of Colorado are the South Platte, the upper forks of the Kansas, Arkansas, Rio Grande, White, Green, Gunnison, and Grand, the last being the main head-water of the Colorado River. Many of these streams traverse the mountains in deep and narrow gorges (cañons), which contribute some of the most imposing features of scenery in the state. Such gorges are the "Royal Gorge" or Cañon of the Arkansas, incised through the Archean granites to a depth of 2600-3000 feet; the Cañon of the Grand River, and the Toltec Gorge, in the south. Other remarkable features of scenery in the state are the earth-pillars and monuments and rock-spires that attest the erosion of the land-surface, beautifully exhibited in the Garden of the Gods, near Manitou, in Monument Park and elsewhere.

Climate.—The rainfall is small as compared with that of most maritime regions, being over most of the state less than 15 inches and rarely exceeding 20 inches. There is a noteworthy freedom from malarious diseases, and the whole region has a high reputation as a resort for consumptives. The great elevation of the state gives it a delightful summer climate. Little snow falls in winter, even upon the mountains, and cattle feed upon the self-cured and unharvested grasses throughout the winter. The pure air, the fine scenery, and the clear skies of Colorado are praised by every tourist.

Agriculture.—Agriculture is not carried on to any great extent, except in places where irrigation can be effected. Thus treated, the lands yield generously all the ordinary cereal grains and the root-crops of northern culture. In 1900 the total area under cultivation was estimated at only 2,600,000 acres. The production of wheat was 7,200,000 bushels; of corn, 3,190,000 bushels; oats, 3,270,000 bushels; and hay, 1,780,000 tons. Garden and dairy products are specialties at some points, and the orchard-fruits are in some parts brought to a degree of perfection that is hardly attained elsewhere. In general, cattle-grazing and sheep-husbandry are the leading pursuits kindred to agriculture. For these occupations no part of the Union seems better adapted. The vegetation of the plains is mainly that of herbs or low shrubs and grasses, displaying at times, and even at altitudes of 8000-9000 feet, a wonderful profusion of flowers ("prairie vegetation"). Box-elder, cottonwood, and a few other kinds of trees grow very sparingly along the streams in the E. section; and a large amount of pine has been cut.

Mineral Resources.—The state is pre-eminently rich in minerals and presents many centres of extremely remunerative mining. Gold, silver, lead, copper, and iron represent the metallic wealth of the state, which is also largely supplied with coal and petroleum. The best-known silver-lead mining centres are Leadville, Aspen, Silverton, Creede, and Telluride, while the most productive gold region is that of Cripple Creek, lying near the NW. foot of Pike's Peak. The value of the mineral yield for the state was, in 1900, about $65,000,000; in 1903 the gold product was valued at $22,540,100 and the silver (commercially) at $7,014,708. The coal (and lignite) mined during the same year was 7,400,000 tons. Hot and mineral springs occur at numerous points, among the best known being those at or near Manitou, Buena Vista (Cottonwood Springs, etc.), Glenwood Springs, and Ouray.

Counties and Population.—The counties in 1900 were: Arapahoe, Archuleta, Baca, Bent, Boulder, Chaffee, Cheyenne, Clear Creek, Conejos, Costilla, Custer, Delta, Dolores, Douglas, Eagle, Elbert, El Paso, Fremont, Garfield, Gilpin, Grand, Gunnison, Hinsdale, Huerfano, Jefferson, Kiowa, Kit Carson, Lake, La Plata, Larimer, Las Animas, Lincoln, Logan, Mesa, Mineral, Montezuma, Montrose, Morgan, Otero, Ouray, Park, Phillips, Pitkin, Prowers, Pueblo, Rio Blanco, Rio Grande, Routt, Saguache, San Juan, San Miguel, Sedgwick, Summit, Teller, Washington, Weld, and Yuma. Adams, Denver, and South Arapahoe counties have been organized since. Pop. in 1900, 539,700. The chief cities and towns are Denver, the capital, with, in 1900, 133,859 inhabitants; Pueblo (28,157), Colorado Springs (21,085), Leadville (12,456), Cripple Creek (10,147), Boulder (6150), and Trinidad (5345).

The state has numerous institutions of advanced learning, the more important of which are the state university at Boulder, the University of Denver at University Park, the state school of mines at Golden, and Colorado College at Colorado Springs. A state normal school is located at Greeley, and the Denver Normal and Preparatory School at Denver.

History and Government.—Cave dwellings and remains of Indian pueblos have been found in the southern part of the state. Two-thirds of Colorado, including the western half and a tract along the S. line, belonged to Mexico until 1848, and was regarded as a portion of New Mexico; and a portion of this tract has long supported a scanty Spanish-American population with a strong admixture of Indian blood. The discovery of gold in 1859 was followed by a rapid influx of settlers. In 1861 the territory was organized. In 1876 Colorado became a state of the Union. The governor is elected for a term of two years. Senators and representatives, the aggregate number of which cannot exceed 100, are elected for four and two years respectively. Colorado is represented by 3 members in the National Congress.

Colorado, a county in the southeast-central part of Texas, has an area of 948 sq. m. It is intersected by the Colorado River, which is navigable by steamboats. Capital, Columbus. Pop. in 1890, 19,512; in 1900, 22,203.

Colorado, Warren co., Pa., 10 miles N. by E. of Pit-hole. It has afforded much petroleum.

Colorado Desert, a name frequently applied to the arid sections of southeastern California, bordering upon Arizona, the general surface of which is considerably depressed—in places 100 to 250 feet—below sea-level. It receives at times the surplus discharge (overflows) of the Colorado River, which is retained in temporary lake-basins (Salton Lake, etc.).

Colorado River, Tex., rises in the table-lands in the NW. part of the state, by two branches, called the North Fork and Salt Fork, which unite near lat. 32° N. The river takes a generally S.E. course and enters Matagorda Bay just SW. of Matagorda. It is the largest river running through the state, except the Brazos, and is about 650 miles long. The principal towns on its banks are Austin, Bastrop, and La Grange. Steamboats can ascend it to Austin, upward of 200 miles, except when the water is low and shallow, and draft-boats about 50 miles further.

Colorado River, sometimes called Colorado of the West, is formed by two head-streams, the Green and Grand rivers, which rise respectively in the Rocky Mountains of Wyoming and Colorado and unite in Utah near lat. 38° 16' N. and lon. 109° 45' W. The Colorado runs south-westward through the high, treeless, and arid table-land of Utah, whence it passes southward into Arizona and runs for 250 miles or more in a profound chasm called the Grand Cañon of the Colorado, one of the most wonderful natural formations of the globe. (See GRAND CAÑON OF THE COLORADO.) Below this cañon the river runs southward, forming the boundary between Arizona on one side and Nevada and California on the other, and enters the Gulf of California in Mexico. Its length, exclusive of the branches, is estimated at upward of 1100 miles, and the area drained by it at 250,000 sq. m. Steamboats can ascend it about 500 miles from its mouth, or to the mouth of the Virgin River. The Colorado receives no large tributaries from the west; the more important ones from the east are the Gila, the Little Colorado or Colorado Chiquito, and the San Juan. Many of its minor tributaries are incised in deep cañons like the major stream. At its mouth the river has a breadth of about 1300 feet, with a depth of water, varying according to the tides, of from 7 to 32 feet. At high-water there is frequently a discharge into the depressed lands of south-eastern California.

Coliguape, ko-loo-gwá-pá, or Colhué, a lake of the Argentine Republic, in the territory of Chubut, supposed to discharge its waters into the Senguel.

Columbia, or Oregon, the largest river of North America, with the exception of the Yukon, that discharges into the Pacific Ocean, rises in the Upper Columbia Lake (close to the Kootenay River), British Columbia, on the W. slope of the Rocky Mountains, near lat. 50° 13' N. and lon. 115° 50' W., at an elevation of 2700 feet. It runs first northward and subsequently southward through the Arrow Lakes to the northern boundary of Washington, near which it receives a large affluent called Clark's Fork or River. From this point its course is very circuitous, and directed to the Oregon frontier, a few miles before reaching which it receives its largest affluent, the Snake (Shoshone or Lewis) River. Changing its flow westward, it forms the boundary between Oregon and Washington for about 350 miles and enters the Pacific Ocean at the NW. extremity of Oregon through an estuary about 35 miles long and 2-7 miles wide. The tide ascends it about 160 miles to the Cascades, a series of rapids caused by the passage of the river through the Cascade Range. The length of the Columbia is estimated at 1400 miles. The Columbia is a rapid stream and traverses a mountainous region which is remarkable for grand and picturesque scenery. Basalt and other volcanic rocks underlie a large part of the valley of this river, especially that part which is in Washington. The area drained by it is estimated to be about 260,000 sq. m. At the junction with the Snake it has a width of nearly 4000 feet, while at the Dalles it is contracted to less than 250 feet.

This river is divided into four main navigable sections. The first is from its mouth to the Cascades, a distance of 160 miles. As far up as Vancouver, at the mouth of the Willamette (a large affluent from the S.), it is a broad, deep river, navigable at all seasons by the largest vessels that cross the bar at its mouth. The second section of the Columbia is from the Cascades to the Dalles, a distance of 50 miles, where the obstruction of the Dalles of the Columbia is encountered. (See DALLES.) The third navigable section reaches from Celilo to Priest's Rapids, about 185 miles, and the fourth extends from near Colville upward, about 250 miles, and is navigable by small steamboats. Passenger steamboats now make the traverse direct from the Dalles to the lower river. Among the tributaries that have not been mentioned are the Spokane on the E. and the Okanogan, Wenatchee, and Yakima on the W., all in Washington, and further down the Deschutes, in Oregon.

Congo, kong'go, or Zaire, sā-ee'rā, a river of equatorial Africa, one of the largest rivers in the world. Its basin, estimated at about 1,600,000 sq. m., is the largest after that of the Amazon. Little was known of its extent and importance until 1877, when its relations were determined by Stanley. The Congo has its origin in two head-waters, which unite in about lat. 6° 25' S. and lon. 27° E.—the Luapula, having its source (as the Chambesi and Chasi) in the highlands which extend between Lakes Tanganyika and Nyansa, about 450 miles from the Indian Ocean, and the Lualaba, which rises in the Lokinga Mountains, lat. 12°-13° S., close to the head-waters of the Zambesi. (See CHAMBERS, LUAPULA, and LUALABA.) Almost immediately after this junction the river receives on the right the Lukuga, an irregular feeder from Lake Tanganyika. From this point the Congo flows generally northward to the equator, where it bends northward and completes the remarkable horse-shoe curve which brings it down to its estuary in lat. 6° S. The total length of the river has been estimated at from 2500 to 2800 miles. Its principal tributaries, some of which are rivers almost of the first magnitude, are the Aruwimi, which rises within a short distance of the Albert Nyansa, one of the head-basins of the Nile, Ubanghi (or Ubanghi-Welle), which also rises close to the Nile water-parting, the Sanga, and the Lomami and Kasai, the two last-named being tributaries from the south. A most extensive system of navigable waters is added by these streams to the main river. The region drained by the Congo is a depressed basin, in its principal part between 1000 and 1500 feet elevation, which is bordered on its periphery by fairly lofty mountains or highland, and shelves gradually towards the Atlantic Ocean. Not unlikely it represents a former interior sea, whose waters have gradually drained off into the Atlantic Ocean through the cut which the Congo has opened across the coast mountains. The volume of water in the Congo is prodigious, but the navigability of the stream is broken by series of rapids in different parts of its course, and most unfortunately so in its lower section. Between Stanley Pool and the Yellala Falls, the lowest of the rapids, there is a descent, in a direct distance of about 170 miles, of 900 feet, the fall being through more than 30 distinct rapids. A railroad has latterly been constructed between Matadi and Stanley Pool, establishing commercial connection between the lower Congo and its middle course, which affords uninterrupted navigation to Stanleyville, Stanley Falls, or the "Seven Rapids," a distance of 980 miles. The Congo is in this section a magnificent stream, broadening out in places to 7-8 miles or more, and maintaining a very considerable depth. The discharge at Stanley Pool during high-water reaches probably 2,000,000 cubic feet per second. In its upper course the Congo is again badly interrupted by falls and rapids and, although still a noble water beyond Nyangwe, is hardly serviceable for navigation. The estuary is an open one, upward of 100 miles in length, with a width of 5-6 miles, and having a depth of water of 200 feet or more. Below Matadi the most important stations on the river are Boma and Banana, the latter at the river's mouth. The mouth of the Congo was discovered by the Portuguese navigator, Diogo Cam (Cão), in 1482.

Congo Free State, a political division of Africa, under the sovereignty of the King (Leopold II.) of the Belgians. It includes a small detached tract on the N. bank of the river Congo, extending from the sea inland to the French possessions; but its main area reaches from the mouth of the river Likona (an affluent of the Congo from the N.) northward to lat. 6° N., thence E. to lon. 32° E. (just N. of the Albert Nyansa), thence southward to about 13° 30' S., beyond Lake Bangweolo, and westward to a point on the S. bank of the river Congo, on the border of the Portuguese territory of Angola. The area of this vast region, which abuts eastward upon the Nile basin, is constituted almost exclusively by the drainage-basin of the Congo and its affluents. The surface, which covers approximately 900,000 sq. m., is in the main a depressed planular tract, 900-1500 feet in elevation, surrounded by lofty highland and mountains. (See CONGO.) It is the most completely watered of the African regions, and supports over a large part of its area a magnificent and almost impenetrable forest. The chief commercial products are rubber, ivory, copal, palm-kernels, palm oil, and dye-stuffs. Coffee, cacao, and tobacco are successfully cultivated, but not yet sufficiently for export. The value of the rubber export was in 1899 about $5,500,000; of ivory, about $1,000,000. The population, which is variously estimated at from 12,000,000 to 30,000,000, consists chiefly of Bantu tribes (Warus, Manyema, Warega, etc.), some of whom still practise cannibalistic habits, and of several races of pygmies (Akka, Wambutti, etc.). The European population in Jan., 1903, numbered 2365, of whom 1417 were Belgians. Among the chief settlements are Banana and Boma, ports on the lower Congo; Matadi, Vivi, Leopoldville, Kimboko, Bangala, Coquilhatville (formerly Equatorville), Bansiville, and Stanley Falls or Falls Station. The Congo Free State was founded in 1884 under the auspices of the Congo International Association and its status fixed by the concerted action of the Christian powers. It has its central government at Brussels, with a governor-general resident at Boma, the official capital of the territory. By a will of Aug., 1889, the King of the Belgians bequeathed to Belgium all his sovereign rights to the State.

Congo, French, a region of west-central Africa, extending on the coast between the German Kamerun territory on the N. and Kabinda on the S., and inland to the Congo and Ubanghi rivers, and northeastward to about lon. 18° 30' E. (where it abuts upon the French territory of Ubanghi, sometimes unofficially considered a part of the Congo territory) and lat. 10° N. (directly S. of Lake Chad). It thus comprises a part of the water-shed of the Shari River. In its further extension as a military protectorate it reaches Lake Chad and the Bahr-el-Ghazal. The physical characteristics of much of the region are those of the Congo Free State, which forms most of its SE. boundary, having extensive forests watered by numerous streams. Several mountain-ridges extend in the western part in courses more or less parallel with the sea-coast, of which the more prominent are the Siete Sierras (Serra do Crystal or Crystal Mountains), with the culminating Mont de Crystal (about 5000 feet). The chief rivers other than the Ubanghi and the Congo are the Sanga, Likuala (both tributaries of the Congo), and the Ogouai or Ogoué, the last having a course of upward of 700 miles and draining an area of about 130,000 sq. m. The Gabun, an estuary at the mouth of which is situated the capital of the colony, Libreville, affords one of the finest harbors on the African coast. The climate is largely equatorial in character, but showing great variations of temperature on the sea-border and in the mountains, with the mercury ranging from 60° to 120°. The annual rainfall is in places 120-130 inches. The forests contain valuable woods, and there is a considerable export of rubber, palm oil, palm kernels, and kola-nuts. Coffee, cacao, and vanilla are largely cultivated. The mineral resources include gold, copper, and iron. Telegraph lines are now being laid across the country, and a railroad is projected to connect Libreville with the Congo. The chief towns or settlements are Libreville, Loango, Franceville, and Brazzaville. The colony is administered by a commissioner-general. The population, consisting of negro and other races, is estimated at from 8,000,000 to 13,000,000.

Congress, a post-town of Yavapai co., Ariz., in a gold-mining region, 70 miles by rail SW. of Prescott. The banking point is Prescott or Phoenix. Pop. about 1000.

Congress, a post-village of Wayne co., Ohio, 12 miles NW. of Wooster. Pop. in 1900, 198.

Congress Park, a post-village of Cook co., Ill. The banking point is Lagrange. Pop. about 400.

Congruity, a post-hamlet of Westmoreland co., Pa., 8 miles N. of Greensburg.

Conhocton (or Cohocton) River, N.Y., rises near the northern boundary of Steuben co. and unites with the Tioga River about 1 mile NW. of Corning. The stream formed by this confluence is the Chemung River. The Conhocton is nearly 60 miles long.

Comi, a town and province of Italy. See CUNEO.

Comil, ko-neel', a fishing town of Spain, 22 miles SSE. of Cadix, on the Atlantic Ocean. Pop. in 1900, 5579.

Comimbriga, the ancient name of COMBRA.

Conisbrough, kon'is-brūh, a village of England, co. of York, West Riding, on the Don, 7 miles NE. of Rotherham.

Conistom Lake, a fine lake of England, co. of Lancashire, 4 miles W. of Hawkshead. It is 6 miles in length from N. to S., having at its N. extremity the romantic Conistom Fells, in which are slate-quarries and copper-mines. On its shores are Brantwood, the home of Ruskin, and Tent House, at one time the abode of Tennyson. Near by is the Old Man of Conistom, a peak 2633 feet in elevation.

Conjeveram, kon'jev-er-am' or kon-jev'er-gum (anc. Conjevera, "the golden city"), a town of British India, on the river Palar, 42 miles SW. of Madras, in the district of Chingleput. It is one of the holy cities of the Hindus; the place is a collection of villages interspersed with gardens, and has several temples and pagodas. Pop. about 40,000.

Conklin, a post-village of Ottawa co., Mich. The banking point is Coopersville. Pop. 90.

Conklin, or Conklin Station, a post-village of Broome co., N.Y., in Conklin township (town), on the Susquehanna River and on the Lackawanna R., 8 miles SE. of Binghamton, its banking point. Pop. of the town in 1900, 946.

Conkling, a post-hamlet of Owalee co., Ky., 7 miles S. of Booneville.

Conkling Forks, a post-hamlet of Broome co., N.Y.

Conklingville, a post-village of Saratoga co., N.Y., on Sacondaga River, about 50 miles N. of Albany.

Conley, a post-village of Clayton co., Ga., on the Southern R. Pop. 80. The banking point is Atlanta.

Conlie, kōn'lee', a town of France, in Sarthe, 12 miles SW. of Le Mans. Pop. about 1500.

Conlogue, kōn'lōg', a post-hamlet of Edgar co., Ill., 5 miles W. of Paris.

Conna, a village of Ireland, co. of Cork, 5 miles WNW. of Tallow.

Connah's Quay, a seaport of Flintshire, Wales, on the Dee, 4 miles SE. by E. of Flint. Pop. in 1901, 3396.

Con'nassau'ga River rises in Fannin co., Ga., and unites with the Coosawattie about 3 miles E. of Resaca, Ga. The stream formed by this union is the Oostenaula River.

Connaught, kon'nawt (L. Conna'cia), the smallest of the four provinces of Ireland, bounded on the N. and W. by the Atlantic Ocean, E. by Ulster and Leinster, and SE. by Munster. Area, 6850 sq. m. The W. portion is broken into peninsulas, the largest of which is Connemara, and numerous islands, as Achill, Innisbegil, Clare, Innisboffin, Arranmore, etc. The many bays and sounds afford commodious harbors. The W. part of the province, including the islands, is mountainous; the N. and S. extremities are also elevated, while the centre forms one level plain. The principal rivers are the Shannon, which forms most of the eastern boundary, the Moy, the Clare, and the Suak, an affluent of the Shannon. The lakes of Connaught include Lough Corrib, Lough Mask, Lough Conn, and Lough Allen; Lough Ree and Lough Derg are on the borders. Coal is found in Lough Allen district. The province is divided into the counties of Mayo, Galway, Sligo, Leitrim, and Roscommon. Population is almost entirely Celtic. Connaught was once a kingdom of the Irish heptarchy, ruled by the O'Connors. In 1590 it was divided into counties by the English. Pop. in 1901, 649,630.

Connaught, kon'nawt, a post-village of Dundas co., Ontario, 23 miles from Matilda.

Conneaut, kon'ne-awt', a post-village of Ashtabula co., Ohio, is on Conneaut Creek, 2 miles from Lake Erie, and on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern and the New York, Chicago and St. Louis R., 68 miles NE. of Cleveland. It has a good harbor at the mouth of the creek. It has railroad shops, planing- and flour-mills, manufactures of leather and canned goods, nickel- and tin-plate works, a foundry, etc. Pop. in 1890, 3241; in 1900, 7133.

Conneaut, a township of Crawford co., Pa., on the Ohio boundary. Pop. in 1900, 1477.

Conneaut, a township of Erie co., Pa., on the Ohio boundary. Pop. in 1900, 1329.

Conneaut Creek rises in Crawford co., Pa., passes into Ashtabula co., Ohio, and enters Lake Erie nearly 2 miles from the NE. extremity of Ohio. It is about 70 miles long.

Conneaut Lake, a banking post-borough of Crawford co., Pa., on the Bessemer and Lake Erie R. It has stock-breeding interests. Pop. in 1900, 343.

Con'neaut'ville, a banking post-borough of Crawford co., Pa., on Conneaut Creek and on the Pennsylvania and the Pittsburg, Bessemer and Lake Erie R., 15 miles NW. of Meadville. It has milling and other industries. Pop. in 1890, 757; in 1900, 920.

Connecticut, kon-net'e-kut, a beautiful river, the largest in New England, rises in the extreme northern part of New Hampshire, in Coos co., by several branches (one of which is formed in Connecticut Lake), which unite near the NE. extremity of Vermont. It runs southward and south-westward and forms the entire boundary between New Hampshire and Vermont. Below the mouth of the White River, which is in Windsor co., Vt., its general direction is nearly southward. Having crossed the northern boundary of Massachusetts, it intersects the counties of Franklin, Hampshire, and Hampden, in that state, and passes into the state of Connecticut. It runs southward through Hartford co. to Middletown, below which it flows southeastward, until it enters Long Island Sound, at Saybrook Point, 30 miles E. of New Haven. It is about 400 miles long and drains an area of about 11,000 sq. m. Large steamboats ascend it to Hartford, above which the navigation has been improved by canals around several falls. The Windsor Locks make continuous navigation for smaller vessels to Holyoke. The largest affluents that enter it from the west, or right, are the Passumpsic, White, Deerfield, Westfield, and Farmington rivers. From the other side it receives the Ammonoosuc, Miller's, and Chicopee rivers. The chief towns on its banks are Hartford and Middletown in Connecticut, Springfield, Holyoke, and Northampton in Massachusetts, and Brattleboro, Vermont. The valley of the Connecticut is celebrated for its beauty and fertility. The scenery is diversified by terraces, bluffs, mountains, and broad tracts of level alluvial land. Turner's Falls and Belows Falls mark, among other places, points of interruption in the river's course by falls or rapids. The course of the river is largely through the Triassic red sandstones in which have been found numerous footprints of extinct reptiles and birds.

Connecticut, one of the New England or Eastern states of the American Union, bounded N. by Massachusetts, E. by Rhode Island, S. by Long Island Sound (an arm of the Atlantic Ocean), and W. by New York. Its shore-line extends 100 miles from the mouth of the Byram River, at the SW. angle of the state, to the mouth of the Pawcatuck River, which separates it for some distance from Rhode Island. All the principal islands in the sound belong to New York. Area, 4990 sq. m., of which the land occupies 4845 sq. m. It is the smallest state in the Union except Rhode Island and Delaware.

Face of the Country.—Three principal river-valleys occupy the greater part of the state's area,—the valley of the Thames, with its tributaries the Yantic, Quinnebaug, Shetucket (Willimantic), etc., in the E., that of the Connecticut in the centre, and that of the Housatonic (with the Naugatuck, Shepaug, etc.), in the W. The E. portion of the state consists of rounded, stony hills, affording rich pasturage, with narrow valleys and many well-utilized mill-streams, and the region supports a thrifty agricultural and manufacturing population. The Connecticut valley, especially near the river and in the parts remote from the sound, is exceedingly fertile; but its southern portion is to some extent broken and contains some unproductive tracts. In the W. the surface is rough, and the hills are often precipitous; but the valley lands, though of scanty area, have a very generous soil, and dairy-farming is successfully carried on. The water-power of western Connecticut is largely put to use. Some of the higher hills of this region are considered mountains, but deserve that name not so much for their height as for their abrupt character (Bear Mountain, 2355 feet; Gridley Mountain, 2200 feet,—both in the town of Salisbury). They are continuous with the Berkshire and Taconic Mountains of Massachusetts and, in part, with the Highlands of New York.

Geology and Minerals.—The greater part of Connecticut is underlain directly by Azoic rocks of granitic or gneissoid character, with abundant marks of glacial action and bearing large drift deposits. In the NW. there is a limited area of the Devonian age; and the immediate valley of the Connecticut, except in the lower part, is Triassic. At Portland, opposite Middletown, is quarried in great quantities the valuable brownstone, a favorite building-material that has had large application especially in the city of New York. Extensive trap dikes occur at many points. Valuable iron-ores have long been wrought at Salisbury (since 1732), Kent, Roxbury, Canaan, Cornwall, Sharon, and other places, chiefly westward, and the metal produced is of the highest grade of excellence. Copper, lead, nickel, tungsten, cobalt, and other metals have been obtained at various points, but most of them not in paying quantities. Other mineral and quarry products are lime, marble, cement, flagstone, feldspar, and barium sulphate. There are sulphurous chalybeate and other mineral waters in the state.

Agriculture, though by no means a leading industrial pursuit here, is on the whole a fairly remunerative one, owing to the proximity of markets and the existence of a large number of manufacturing towns. Fruit, hay, and dairy-products are the principal staples in the E. and W. sections. Indian corn, rye, oats, and potatoes are profitable crops in nearly all parts. The product of the different crops was, in 1900, corn, 1,771,000 bushels; wheat, 6864 bushels; oats, 579,000 bushels; rye, 239,800 bushels; buckwheat, 60,300 bushels; potatoes, 2,478,500 bushels; and hay, 427,400 tons (valued at $7,150,000). Tobacco is extensively grown in the Connecticut valley. There were in the state, in 1900, 418 cigar and tobacco factories, whose combined product was 44,175,000 cigars, 204,670 cigarettes, and 25,300 pounds of smoking tobacco. Market-gardening is a profitable occupation near the larger towns and cities.

The manufactures of the state are very extensive. It ranks among the foremost states not only in the amount of capital invested in manufacturing, but also in the quantity and value of the products. Important interests are the manufacture of clocks, paper, fire-arms, carriages, automobiles, bicycles, cotton, woolen and silk goods, machinery, gunpowder, india-rubber, carpets, hosiery, leather, furniture, boots and shoes, fish-oil and fertilizers, iron, hardware, Britannia wares, pins and needles, straw goods, hats, saddlery, jewelry, and an infinite variety of small wares. Foremost in the line of manufacturing industries is that of the manufacture of brass and brass goods, the product of which in 1900 had a valuation of $60,750,000. Next in rank is that of the manufacture of rubber goods, with a product of $18,944,000. The product of (general) hardware manufactures was valued at $12,600,000; of cottons, about $15,000,000; woollens of all kinds, $12,490,000; silk goods, $11,650,000; and paper and paper goods, $5,592,000.

Counties and Cities.—Connecticut has 8 counties,—Hartford, New Haven, New London, Fairfield, Litchfield, Windham, Middlesex, and Tolland. The larger cities are Hartford (the capital), with a population in 1900 of 79,850; New Haven, the largest city, with 108,027 inhabitants; Bridgeport, 70,996; Waterbury, 45,859; New Britain, 26,998; Meriden, 24,296; New London, 17,548; Norwich, 17,251; Danbury, 16,537; Stamford, 15,997; and Ansonia, 12,681.

Railroads, Commerce, and Communication.—The state is well supplied with railroads, the mileage in the main line and its branches being, in 1900, 1025. The Connecticut River is navigated by steamboats as far as Hartford, and by smaller craft, using the Windsor Locks, into Massachusetts; the Thames to Norwich. Steamers from New York and elsewhere call regularly at the principal sound ports, and sailing-vessels also carry on a large coasting trade. The old whale, cod- and seal-fisheries no longer have their former importance. There is a considerable industry in the harvesting and propagation of shell-fish, especially the oyster. The oyster-grounds under cultivation comprise nearly 64,000 acres.

The principal harbors of the state are those of Stonington, Mystic, New London, Saybrook, New Haven, and Bridgeport; and there are others at Niantic, Guilford, Clinton, Branford, Milford, Southport, Black Rock, Norwalk, Stamford, Greenwich, etc. Bridgeport, New Haven, Hartford, New London, and Stonington are ports of entry; Stamford is a subport of entry.

Education.—The public school system of Connecticut has a wide reputation. Among the most celebrated institutions of learning are Yale University, New Haven, founded in 1701; Trinity College, Hartford; Wesleyan University, Middletown; and the Hartford Theological Seminary. There is a large asylum (school) for the deaf and dumb at Hartford, and minor schools of a like character, industrial and normal schools, hospitals, etc., are found in the other cities.

Constitution.—Up to 1818 there was no state constitution, the royal charter of Charles II., granted in 1662, serving to that date as the basis of government. In 1818 the present constitution was adopted. The governor is chosen for a term of two years. The legislature consists of a senate of 24 members, elected for a term of two years, and a house of representatives, whose members (some 255 in number) are chosen from each town for the term of a single year. The state is represented by 5 members in the national congress.

History.—The Dutch colonists of New Netherland (New York) in 1633 planted a small settlement on the site of Hartford. Previous to this, in 1631, Lord Say and Sele had obtained a patent for the region in which this was located, and, immediately after the advent of the Dutch, one Holmes, from Plymouth, sailed up the Connecticut and, in spite of the opposition of the Dutch, set up a trading-post upon the site of the present town of Windsor. Wethersfield was colonized by emigrants from Massachusetts Bay in 1634, and in 1635 others from the same colony settled Windsor and Hartford. In 1636 a large immigration to these settlements took place from the towns of Massachusetts. The system of town government which prevailed in Massachusetts was established in the new colony. Saybrook (named for Lord Say and Sele and Lord Brooke), at the mouth of the Connecticut, was settled in 1639. Its existence as a separate colony terminated in 1644, when it was annexed to the Connecticut colony. The Pequot Indians were crushed in 1637. In 1638 the foundations of an independent Puritan colony were laid in the settlement of New Haven. In 1662 a charter, providing for autonomous government, was granted by Charles II. to the colony of Connecticut, with which the colony of New Haven was incorporated. New Haven rebelled against the disposition that was thus made of it, but was soon forced to submit. In 1687, Sir Edmund Andros, royal governor of New England, demanded from the General Assembly the surrender of the colonial charter in the king's name, but that document was removed and secreted. The old charter of Connecticut insured a local government far more liberal than most others that obtained in New England. In 1776 Connecticut renounced its allegiance to England and was constituted an independent state. In 1818 a new constitution came into operation, by which the remnants of the bond of union which had so long subsisted between state and church were finally severed. The legislature was held alternately at New Haven and Hartford until 1874, when Hartford became the sole capital.

Population.—In 1776 Connecticut had about 200,000 inhabitants; in 1790, 237,946; in 1800, 251,002; in 1810, 261,942; in 1820, 275,148; in 1830, 297,675; in 1840, 309,978; in 1850, 370,792; in 1860, 460,147; in 1870, 537,454; in 1880, 632,700; in 1890, 746,258; in 1900, 906,355, of which number 15,200 were negroes, 599 Chinese, and 153 residential Indians.

Connecticut Lake, a post-hamlet of Coos co., N.H., on a small lake, one of the sources of the Connecticut River.

Connellsville, a banking post-borough of Fayette co., Pa., on the Youghiogheny River, at the base of Chestnut Ridge, and on the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania Rrs., 53 miles SSE. of Pittsburgh. It lies opposite New Haven, with which it is connected by bridge. Connellsville has manufactures of coke (the most important in the United States, giving employment to more than 7000 hands), iron, tin-plate, railroad- and mine-cars, automobiles, machinery of various kinds, etc. Pop. in 1890, 5629; in 1900, 7160.

Connellsville, a township of Fayette co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 3653.

Connelly, a post-village of Ulster co., N.Y. The banking point is Kingston or Rondout.

Connellys Springs, a post-village of Burke co., N.C., on the Southern R. The banking point is Morganton. Pop. 150.

Connemara, kon'-ne-már-rá (i.e., "the bays of the ocean"), a district of Ireland, co. of Galway, occupying its W. portion, about 30 miles in length and from 15 to 20 miles in breadth. It consists chiefly of mountains and bogs, interspersed with many small lakes and bays.

Conner, a post-village of Somerset co., Pa. Pop. about 100.

Conner Creek, a gold-mining camp of Baker co., Oregon, 3 miles from the Snake River.

Connera, or Könnern, kön'-nérn, a town of Prussian Saxony, 16 miles NW. of Halle. Pop. in 1900, 4277.

Connero (or Conneccross) Creek, S.O., enters the Klowee River in Anderson co.

Conners Creek, a post-village of Wayne co., Mich., 6 miles NE. of Detroit, its banking point. Pop. about 600.

Connersville, kon'-nérn-víl, a post-hamlet of Jefferson co., Ala., 8 miles from Elyton.

Connersville, a banking city of Indiana, the capital of Fayette co., is on the Whitewater River and on the Lake Erie and Western and other railroads, 22 miles SW. of Richmond. It has manufactures of axles, mirrors, flour, furniture, rotary blowers, wagons and carriages, etc. Pop. in 1890, 4548; in 1900, 6836.

Connersville, a post-hamlet of Decatur co., Kan., 50 miles N. of Buffalo station.

Connersville, a post-village of Harrison co., Ky., about 25 miles N. of Lexington. Pop. 150.

Connersville, a post-village of Dunn co., Wis., 18 miles N. of Knapp. See Downing.

Connersville, a post-village of the Chickasaw Nation, I.T., about 35 miles from Davis. Pop. in 1900, 189.

Conn, Lough (lón), a lake of Ireland, co. of Mayo, between Castlebar and Ballina, about 10 miles in length and 2 or 3 miles in breadth. Its lower extremity is called Lough Calles.

Connor, a decayed episcopal city of Ireland, co. of Antrim, 18 miles NNW. of Belfast.

Connor, Wyandotte co., Kan. See Wolcott.

Conococheague, kon'-o-ko-chig', a post-village of Washington co., Md., on Conococheague Creek, 4 miles N. of Williamsport.

Conococheague (or Conecocheague) Creek is formed by the East and West Branches, which drain Franklin co., Pa., and unite 3 miles N. of the southern boundary of that state. It enters the Potomac River at Williamsport, Md.

Conocoon, Sierra, se-én'-áá ko-no-kón', a mountainside of British Guiana, extending in a NE. direction from lat. 3° N. Through it the Rupunany River has forced a passage.

Conoho, a post-town of Martin co., N.C. The banking point is Tarboro. Pop. about 125.

Conoloway Creek rises in Fulton co., Pa., and enters the Potomac River at Hancock, on the Baltimore and Ohio R.

Conoquesmes'sing, a township of Butler co., Pa., about 26 miles N. of Pittsburgh. Pop. in 1900, 960.

Conoquesmesing, a post-borough of Butler co., Pa. The banking point is Evans City or Butler. Pop. in 1900, 343.

Conotton, Connotton, or Mastersville, a post-village of Harrison co., Ohio, on Conotton Creek and on the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis and the Wheeling and Lake Erie Rrs., 38 miles W. of Steubenville. Pop. about 100.

Conotton Creek, Ohio, rises in Harrison co. and enters the Tuscarawas River about 8 miles N. of New Philadelphia.

Conover, a post-village of Winneshiek co., Iowa, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R., 11 miles SW. of Decorah. Pop. 150.

Conover, a post-town of Catawba co., N.C., on the Western North Carolina R., 3 miles N. of Newton. It has manufactures of wagons, etc. Pop. about 400.

Conover, a post-village of Miami co., Ohio, 11 miles by rail E. of Piqua. Pop. 150.

Conowingo, kon-o-wing'-go, a post-village of Cecil co., Md., on the E. bank of the Susquehanna River and on the Pennsylvania R., 38 miles NE. of Baltimore. Pop. about 200.

Conquerall, kon'-ká-ráll', a post-village of Lunenburg co., Nova Scotia, on the W. bank of the La Have River, 7 miles from Bridgewater.

Conques, kónk, a town of France, in Aude, 5 miles NNE. of Carcassonne, on the Orbial. Pop. about 1500.

Conques, a town of France, in Aveyron, 24 miles NNW. of Rodes. Pop. about 1000.

Conquest, or Conquest Center, a post-village of Cayuga co., N.Y., is in Conquest township (town), 16 miles N. by W. of Auburn. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1360.

Conquista, a town of Brazil. See VICTORIA.

Conrad, a banking post-town of Grundy co., Iowa, 13 miles by rail SE. of Eldora Junction. Pop. in 1900, 483.

Conrad, a post-village of Potter co., Pa. The banking point is Coudersport. Pop. in 1900, 250.

Conrads Mills, a post-hamlet of Middlesex co., Va.

Conroe, a banking post-village, capital of Montgomery co., Tex., on the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé and the International and Great Northern Rrs., 36 miles N. of Houston. It has lumber and cotton interests. Pop. 500.

Consabrum, or Consaburum, the ancient name of CONSERGA.

Conse'con, a post-village of Prince Edward co., Ontario, at the mouth of the Consecon River, 22 miles W. of Belleville. It is on the Central Ontario R. The banking point is Trenton. Pop. about 500.

Conselice, kon-sél'-e-chá, a town of Italy, in the province of Ravenna, 24 miles SSE. of Ferrara. Pop. about 1500 (commune, about 7500).

Conselve, kon-sél'-vá, a town of Italy, province and 12 miles S. of Padua. Pop. about 1000 (commune, 5500).

Constance (Ger. Constanz, Konstanz, kon'-stánts', or Cost'wits; ano. Constan'tia), a fortified city of the grand duchy of Baden, capital of a circle, on the SW. shore of the Lake of Constance, at the efflux of the Rhine, 30 miles by rail E. of Schaffhausen. It is highly picturesque in its architecture. The most imposing building is the cathedral, a fine basilica, originally erected in the eleventh century, afterwards rebuilt and restored in recent times. Here and in the old Dominican convent, now converted into a hotel, the famous Council of Constance (1414-18) held its sittings. In the Konfhaus, or merchants hall, the cardinals met in conclave during the council. Other interesting memorials of the past are the Barbarossa Inn, in which Frederick Barbarossa signed the treaty of Constance with the cities of the Lombard League in 1183, and the modest house in which Huss lodged. Constance is rich in art collections. Its manufacturing industries are extremely diversified, the making of various kinds of textiles being the most prominent. It has an active trade. A fine bridge connects the town with its suburbs on the right bank of the Rhine. Among the places of interest in the charming environs is the country-seat of Arenenberg, where Queen Hortense died. Constance is one of the oldest towns in Germany. It was early the seat of a bishop. It was one of the free imperial cities of the old German Empire, but, in consequence of its seal for the Reformation, it was deprived of its liberties in 1548 and handed over to Austria, which had to cede it to Baden at the time of the Napoleonic wars. Pop. in 1901, 21,345, mostly Catholics. It was formerly a much more populous place.

Constance, a post-hamlet of Boone co., Ky., on the Ohio River, 7 miles below Cincinnati.

Constance, Lake of (anc. Brigantinus Lacus; Ger. Bodensee, bo'-den-zä'), a lake of central Europe, forming a common centre in which Switzerland, Baden, Württemberg, Bavaria, and Austria-Hungary meet. Length, from NW. to SE., 40 miles; greatest breadth, about 8 miles; area, 207 sq. m.; greatest depth, which is between Friedrichshafen and Utweil, 825 feet; elevation above sea-level, 1305 feet. At its NW. extremity the lake is divided into two branches or arms, each about 14 miles in length: the N. arm is called the Überlingen Lake, after the town of Überlingen, on its N. bank; the S. branch is the Untersee, in which is situated the fertile island of Reichenau, belonging to Baden, about 3 miles long and 1½ broad. The Rhine enters the lake at Rheineck, at its SE. extremity, and leaves it at Stein, at its NW. termination. The lake, the waters of which are of a dark-green hue and very clear, is subject, like most of the larger Swiss lakes, to sudden risings. It freezes in severe winters only. Steamers ply on the lake between Constance and various points on its shores (Bregenz, Romanshorn, Rorschach, etc.). The banks are not remarkable for picturesque beauty, but they are extremely fertile, and are covered with cultivated fields, orchards, and gardens, interspersed with ruined castles and with numerous towns and villages, producing a very pleasing and striking effect.

Constantinople, kon-stan-to-no'p'l (Turk. Stambul, stām-bool', or Istambul, modern Gr. Istambol, is-tām'po-le; anc. Gr. Κωνσταντινούπολις; L. Constantinopolis,—i.e., the "city of Constantine"), a city of Turkey in Europe, capital of the Ottoman Empire, in lat. 41° N., lon. 28° 59' E., situated on a declivity or series of gentle hills, at the E. extremity of a triangular promontory, having the Sea of Marmora and the Bosphorus on the S. and E., and the Golden Horn, an inlet of the latter, on the N. It is thus surrounded by water on all sides except the W., which is walled, and has a sea-front altogether about 8 miles in extent. On the opposite side of the Golden Horn, and also occupying the extremity of a promontory, sometimes called the Peninsula of Pera, are situated the extensive suburbs of Galata, the mercantile and shipping quarter; Pera, the European quarter and residence of the foreign ambassadors; and Tophana, named from its cannon-foundry. On the opposite shore of the Bosphorus stands the important commercial and industrial suburb of Soutari. The city is perhaps more beautifully situated than any other large city of Europe, with the exception of Naples, and its appearance from without is extremely picturesque and imposing, with its hundreds of mosques, cupolas, and minarets, interspersed with lofty cypresses, and its port crowded with shipping; but within it consists largely of a labyrinth of crooked, ill-paved, and dirty lanes, and a crowd of low-built and small houses, built of wood or roughly hewn stone. Of late years, following in the course of numerous fires, better and more substantial structures have been erected, and the general modernising of the city has removed from it the entirely quaint and Oriental picturesqueness which still belonged to it 30-40 years ago.

The streets are generally dull and deserted, the bustle and animation of life being confined chiefly to the bazaars. The dress of the people has been largely Europeanised, and there is now an extensive system of cabs and tramways, with gas- and electric-illumination in some parts. The camel service is a thing of the past. A great number of ownerless dogs range the streets, acting as scavengers. The climate is variable and the temperature subject to great changes. The mean temperature of the year is 57.5° Fahr.; February, about 42°; July, 74°.

On the extreme NE. point of the promontory on which the city stands, and on the site of ancient Byzantium, is situated the Seraglio, the former private domain of the sultans, in whose enclosing wall was the large and lofty gate known as the Babi Humayun, the "high door" or "sublime porte" (destroyed by fire in 1863), which has given the common diplomatic name for the Ottoman government. Within the precincts of the palace were the celebrated Divan and the harem, with the "Garden of Delight." A new palace or Seraglio was erected by Abdul-Mejid considerably to the N. of the old one.

The architectural glory of the city, and one of the most famous buildings of the world, is the mosque of St. Sophia, after that of Mecca the principal mosque of the Mohammedan world. It is the finest example of Byzantine style, and was originally built as a Christian church by Justinian between 531 and 538, and converted into a mosque by Mohammed II. in 1453. It is in the form of a Greek cross, 269 feet in length by 143 feet in breadth, and is surmounted by a flattened dome 180 feet in height above the ground, besides several minor cupolas and 4 minarets. Its walls are brick, but the interior is lined with costly marbles and adorned with ancient Byzantine paintings and decorations, the temples of Delos, Baalbec, and Athens having been plundered to add to its splendours. It was restored by Fesati in 1847-1849. Among the principal mosques may be noted those of Aehmet, of Solymán the Magnificent, of Mohammed II., of Bajaset, and the Velide mosque, built by the mother of Mohammed IV. Most of the greater mosques have colleges, and almost all have charitable institutions, named imarets, attached to them, which latter serve at once as poor-houses and hospitals.

The educational development of Constantinople is associated primarily with its three classes of public schools:

primary district schools for boys and girls, in which the pupils are taught to read, write, and cipher, and to recite the Koran; provincial schools of a higher order, for boys only; and the mosque colleges, or Medressehs, for the study of theology and law. In 1867 a lyceum for the higher education was established by Sultan Abdul-Asiz, and in 1900 a new university, with faculties in theology, mathematical and natural science, philosophy, civil law, and medicine, came into active existence, succeeding the university faculties which had previously been established in association with the lyceum or constituted as district schools (medical school, etc.). The number of professors is still limited. Besides these there are special government schools, including the military, naval, and artillery schools, the school of engineering, etc. The Greeks maintain a so-called Great National School, dating from the Middle Ages. Constantinople now possesses numerous libraries, several museums, and scientific and art institutions (museum of antiquities in the garden of the old Seraglio, Russian Archaeological Institute, opened in 1895, Pasteur Institute, founded in 1893, and the Ottoman art school). The city has also a Greek theological seminary. The Literary Greek Society is the most important learned body in the Greek Orient. In the vicinity is Robert College, an excellent institution under American management.

The bazaars for the sale of wares are extensive and well supplied, but with no particular architectural adornment. Among the chief ornaments of the city are its cemeteries. Its antiquities comprise, besides columns, pillars, etc., various subterranean cisterns and the aqueduct of Valens.

The city proper comprises several quarters,—those for the Jews, Armenians, and Greeks. The Greek quarter, the Phanar, extends along the shore of the port or the Golden Horn. This fine harbor extends for about  $\frac{1}{2}$  miles inland in a westerly direction, varying in breadth from about  $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{4}$  mile. Ships of the largest class find safe anchorage here, and there are large graving- and dry-docks. The port, with its busy naval life, is at all times an attractive scenic adjunct to the city. The trade of Constantinople is carried on chiefly by foreigners. The city exports silks and cocoons, carpets and rugs, lambskins, wool, goats' hair, attar of roses, yellow-berries, filigree-work, madder, opium, valonia, etc. Manufacturing is carried on mostly on a small scale. Railways unite Constantinople with Adrianople and Belgrade, and since 1888 there is through railway service from Paris. Constantinople is the see of Greek, Armenian, and Latin patriarchs, the last-named non-resident. The Greek patriarch is the head of the Greek Church in the Ottoman Empire.

The fortifications of the city were extended and reconstructed in 1878, after the war with Russia.

Constantinople is the ancient Byzantium, one of the most flourishing cities in the eastern part of the Greek world, founded as a Dorian colony in the seventh century a.c. In a.d. 330 Byzantium was selected as the capital of the Roman Empire by Constantine the Great, who rebuilt it, renaming it Constantinople. For more than a thousand years from a.d. 395 Constantinople was the capital of the Byzantine, Greek, or Eastern Empire. The city played a leading part in the history of Christianity, the Patriarch of Constantinople rising to the position of head of the Christian Church in the East. No city in the world has stood so many sieges. In 1203 and again in 1204 it was taken by the Venetians and Crusaders, and in 1453 by Mohammed II., who made it the capital of the Ottoman Empire. The population (including suburbs) is estimated at about 1,125,000, comprising Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Franks, Jews, and others.

Copenhagen, ko'pen-há'ghen (Dan. Kjøbenhavn, kyó'bén-hóvn', —i.e., "merchants' haven"; Ger. Köpenhagen, ko'pen-há'ghen; Fr. Copenhague, ko'pen-á'; L. Hafnia), the capital of Denmark, is situated on the Sound, chiefly on the E. coast of Seeland, but partly on the island of Amager, which is separated from Seeland by a narrow arm of the Sound, which forms a harbor at once spacious, deep, and secure. Lat. (observatory) 55° 41' 12" N.; lon. 12° 34' 41" E. Copenhagen occupies a flat so low as to require to be protected by embankments against the Baltic. The part of the city which is on the island of Amager, a modern quarter, bears the name of Christianshavn. It is so surrounded by water as almost to constitute a little island in itself. The extensive suburbs of Copenhagen were formerly separated from the city by the old fortifications. These have been levelled and converted into promenades. A modern system of fortifications on a grand scale, recently constructed far beyond the site of the old ones and embracing canals for flooding the approaches to the city, has converted Copenhagen into a great stronghold. The old citadel of Frederikshavn still remains in the NE. part of the city, but is no longer available for military purposes. Though Copenhagen is an ancient town, in consequence of repeated conflagrations the greater part of its old wooden houses have been replaced by lofty and well-built modern buildings of brick or Norwegian granite; and in architectural character it yields to few European capitals. A portion of the old town is cut off by artificial waterways so as to form a rectangular island, called Slotsholm, or Castle Island, on which is an imposing array of public edifices. These include the buildings pertaining to the famous royal palace of Christiansburg, the main structure of which was destroyed by fire in 1884, the building of the ministries, the royal library, the Thorwaldsen Museum, with a façade in the style of the Etruscan sepulchral structures, the arsenal, and the exchange erected early in the seventeenth century. The principal of the public squares is the Kongens Nytorv (the New King's Market), which constitutes the centre of the city, no fewer than 12 streets opening into it. In its centre is a colossal statue of Christian V. On this square are the old royal palace of Charlottenborg, now converted into an academy of fine arts, and the new national theatre. In front of the former stands the equestrian statue of Frederick VII. and in front of the latter are the statues of the great national writers, Holberg and Oehlenschläger. About a third of a mile to the NE. of the Kongens Nytorv is the octagonal Amalienborg Square, on which are 4 stately palaces, one used for the royal residence. In the centre of the city is the principal church, the Frue Kirke, or Church of Our Lady, adorned with sculptures by Thorvaldsen. Close to it are the university buildings, the university library, and the zoological garden. Further N. are the extensive botanical gardens. Within these grounds or near by are the observatory, with a statue of Tycho Brahe, the new buildings of the polytechnic institute, mineralogical museum, and chemical laboratory, and the art museum. Adjoining are the botanical gardens and the fine old royal palace and park of Rosenborg. The palace is now a museum of regalia, arranged in the chronological order of the Danish sovereigns. Among the prominent churches, in addition to the Frue Kirke, are St. Peter's, or the German church, Trinity church, the great round tower of which was formerly an observatory, and the Church of Our Saviour. The pleasure-grounds and public promenades of the city are on a scale commensurate with its architectural beauties and the wealth of its sculptural monuments. In the western quarter is Ørsted Park, with a statue of the great physicist.

Copenhagen is the chief centre of Scandinavian literature, science, and art. The university, founded in 1478, has, together with the polytechnic institute, over 2000 students. Its library contains about 300,000 volumes. The royal library contains 550,000 volumes and 20,000 MSS. It is particularly rich in Northern literature, and among the MSS. is Raek's unique Sanskrit and Singhalese collection. The museum of Northern antiquities and the ethnographic museum, both forming part of the new national museum established in 1892, are unrivalled of their kind. Thorvaldsen's museum consists of works by that great sculptor and others bequeathed by him to the nation. It comprises also the mausoleum in which he is buried. Among other valuable collections is the royal gallery of paintings.

The harbor of Copenhagen forms the great naval station of Denmark, being capable of enclosing the whole fleet. One portion, in the extreme N., has recently been set off for a free port, and here extensive warehouses have been erected. Among the leading manufacturing establishments of Copenhagen are its porcelain-works, which enjoy a European reputation. Ship-building is extensively carried on, and there are machine-shops, textile-factories, chemical works, sugar-refineries, etc. The city carries on an active commerce by water and land.

Copenhagen is first mentioned, as a fishing hamlet, in 1043. In 1168 Bishop Absalon founded a haven and erected a fort on the Slotsholm as a place of refuge from the Northern pirates. The place then bore the name of Arelhus. Shortly afterwards it rose to importance and acquired its present name of Kjöbenhavn, or Merchants' Haven. The Danish fleet was defeated here by Nelson in 1801. In 1807 the town was bombarded by the British, who carried off the Danish fleet. Pop. in 1890, 312,387; in 1901, 378,235.

Córdoba, kor'do-vá (Sp. Córdoba, kon'do-sá; anc. Cor'duba and Colo'nía Patri'cia, or simply Patri'cia), a city of Spain, in Andalusia, capital of the province of Cordova, on the Guadalquivir, 86 miles NE. of Seville, at an important railway junction. Lat. 37° 52' N.; lon. 4° 49' W. The remains of its Moorish walls, built on Roman foundations, enclose a large area, much of which is now occupied by gardens or by ruins. The city is generally meanly built. It communicates with a suburb across the river by a noble stone bridge of 16 arches, built by the Arabs in the eighth century, and commanded by a Saracenic castle. Its cathedral, formerly one of the most holy mosques of the Mohammedan world, and still one of the most remarkable edifices in Spain, presents in its interior a labyrinth of columns of all orders and materials, which were brought from various ancient temples all around the Mediterranean, and which support elliptical arches. The edifice, which in size and importance stood second only to the mosque of Mecca among the holy places of Islam, measures 570 feet in length and 425 feet in width, thus covering an area approximately equal to that of St. Peter's in Rome. There are many other churches, gorgeously adorned, and an immense number of former convents. Among other noteworthy structures are the bishop's palace and the remains of a palace of the Moorish sovereigns. The town was formerly noted for its leather, made of goat-skins, called Cordovan. The silversmiths and filigree-workers of Cordova still maintain their repute and manufactures of textile fabrics, pottery, etc., are carried on. Many horses are bred here. The town possesses a veterinary institute and other special schools.

Cordova was a place of great importance under the Romans. From 756 to 1031 it was the capital of the great Ommyyad realm in Spain (whose rulers at first styled themselves emir and later caliph), embracing nearly the whole of the peninsula. It is said to have contained in the tenth century nearly a million inhabitants, 300 mosques, 900 baths, and 600 inns. It was styled the Mecca of the West. At this time it was the most splendid seat of the arts, sciences, and literature in the world. In 1236 it was taken and nearly destroyed by Ferdinand III., of Castile. Cordova is the birthplace of the two Senecas, the Roman poet Lucan, and the Arab philosopher Averroës. Pop. of the commune in 1900, 58,275.

It was situated under the northern slope of a steep mountain, 1886 feet high, on which was the citadel, the Acro-Corinthus, and on whose side was the famed fountain of Pirene. It is supposed to have been founded by the Phœnicians. It was one of the most flourishing cities of Greece, being an entrepôt for all merchandise passing from sea to sea across the isthmus, and commanding at the same time all the land traffic from N. to S. Its inhabitants, who excelled in weaving, dyeing, metal-working, and the ceramic arts, founded numerous colonies and acquired great riches, so that Corinth became proverbial for its luxury. It was profusely adorned with fountains, statues, theatres, and public buildings of such excellence in design as to give rise to an order of architecture now known by its name. Ancient Corinth was sacked and nearly destroyed by the Romans 146 B.C.; nearly all the treasures of art there accumulated were carried to Rome. A new city arose under the Romans. Of the ancient structures hardly a vestige remains. In the Middle Ages Corinth passed into the hands of the Venetians, from whom it was wrested by Mohammed II. Until recent times the Acro-Corinthus was a strong fortress. The town was destroyed by an earthquake in 1858. The present town called New Corinth, the capital of the newly constituted nome of Corinthia, lies 3 miles NE. of the site of the old city on the Gulf of Corinth. Pop. in 1896, 4188. The Acro-Corinthus commands a magnificent view.

Corco'gia* or Corra'gia), a city, parliamentary borough, and river-port of Ireland, capital of the co. of Cork, on the Lee, 11 miles above the entrance of Cork Harbor and 137 miles SW. of Dublin. The city proper is built on an island formed by the Lee, which river is here crossed by many bridges, several of them elegant structures. It is the terminus of several railways. Cork is the third city of Ireland in population, being surpassed only by Dublin and Belfast. The houses in the more ancient quarter are mostly of limestone; elsewhere they are of brick, frequently faced with slate. Among the prominent edifices are the new Protestant cathedral and some of the other churches, various monasteries, the city and county court-houses, the mansion-house on a fine walk termed the Mardyke, Queen's College, and Cork Royal Institution. Cork has a large public park and a beautiful cemetery. Its attractive environs are studded with country-residences belonging to merchants. The city of Cork forms a county in itself.

The principal manufactures are leather, iron and other metallic goods, glass, gloves, paper, textiles, fertilisers, beer, and spirits. The trade is extensive, and large sums have recently been expended in deepening the Lee and building quays. (See CORK HARBOR.) Cork is the seat of an Anglican and a Catholic bishop. It sends 2 members to the House of Commons. Cork was founded about A.D. 600. In the twelfth century it acknowledged the sovereignty of Henry II. Corsica, kor'se-ka (anc. Cyr'nos, afterwards Cor'sica; Fr. Corse, kors), an island of a somewhat irregular but compact shape, in the Mediterranean, situated between lat. 41° 20' and 45° N. and lon. 8° 30' and 9° 30' E., separated on the S. from Sardinia by the Strait of Bonifacio, 7 miles wide in its narrowest part. Greatest length, from N. to S., 110 miles; greatest breadth, 53 miles. Area, 3366 sq. m. In the N. it runs out into a long and narrow point of land, about 22 miles long, pointing like an index-finger in the direction of Genoa, and terminating in Cape Corso. The E. coast is remarkable for its uniformity, but the W. coast presents a striking contrast, a number of deep bays following one another in rapid succession. Of these, the most important, proceeding from N. to S., are the Gulfs of Santo Fiorenzo, Calvi, Porto, Sagone, Ajaccio, and Valinco. The interior is covered with mountains, the culminating point, Monte Cinto, in the NW., having a height of 8889 feet, with Monte Rotondo, not far N. of the centre of the island, rising to an almost equal elevation (8610 feet). For the greater part of the year the loftier summits are covered with snow. Numerous streams, or rather torrents, descend precipitously on all sides to the coast. The climate is noted for its salubrity, the E. coast, however, being an exception. The heat is sometimes excessive, but the sky is generally clear, and the air bracing. Owing to the mountainous nature of the surface, much of it still remains in a state of nature. The magnificent primeval forests are, however, being gradually reduced in extent. Forests of stately chestnuts, yielding immense quantities of nuts, climb to great elevations. Nowhere does the olive grow more luxuriantly than in Corsica. The vegetation of the southern Mediterranean zone is well represented in the island.

Above the forest-level are the Alpine pastures, upon which browse multitudes of sheep and goats. The principal agricultural products are grain (mainly wheat), potatoes, olives, wine, and southern fruits (especially lemons). Agriculture is in a very backward state, and in many parts chestnuts are an important staple of food. Timber is largely exported. Fish is abundant in the lagoons along the E. coast. Large quantities of eels, anchovies, and tunny-fishes are caught. The coral fishery is also carried on. Lead, copper, and antimony are mined in small quantities. The mineral products include granite, porphyry, jasper, serpentine, marble, and alabaster. Although the island has belonged to France for more than a century, the population is still almost entirely Italian. The Corsicans are a rustic folk, fond of poetry and clinging to the practices of the past. The vendetta (assassination in connection with hereditary family feuds) has not entirely died out. Manufactures are hardly developed. The chief ports of Corsica are Bastia, Ajaccio, and Calvi. The island forms one of the departments of France. Capital, Ajaccio. Pop. in 1901, 295,589.

The Carthaginians held sway on the coasts of Corsica, and in the second half of the third century B.C. were forced to cede the island to the Romans. In the early part of the Middle Ages the Vandals, Goths, Saracens, and Lombards successively descended upon the island. For a while it belonged to the Frankish realm. It was long a bone of contention between the Pisans and Genoese, the latter remaining masters of it at the close of the thirteenth century. It revolted in the first half of the eighteenth century, and in 1768 it was sold by Genoa to France. An insurrection which broke out in 1793 under the lead of Paoli liberated the island for a brief space, but French authority was re-established in 1796. Napoleon was a native of Corsica.

Costa Rica, ko'stá ree'ká (i.e., "rich coast"), the most southern republic of Central America, bounded NW. by Nicaragua, from which it is partly separated by the river San Juan, NE. by the Caribbean Sea, SE. by Panama, and S. and W. by the Pacific Ocean; between lat. 8° (Punta Burica) and 11° 13' N., lon. 82° 50' and 85° 50' W. Area, about 23,000 sq. m. The Pacific coast is indented by the two large gulfs of Nicoya and Dulce. The country, which is separated by a narrow strip of land from Lake Nicaragua, is traversed from SE. to NW. by the Sierra Talamanca and its continuation, which, near Cartago, is divided by the depression known as the Col d'Ochomopo, from which streams (Reventazón, Tárcoles) flow in opposite directions to the Atlantic and the Pacific basins. These mountains are constructed of very ancient granitic and igneous rocks and attain elevations of 10,000-11,000 feet, or even more. They are flanked by Cretaceous and Tertiary strata, which rise up in mountain ridges subordinate to the main chain. The latter carries a number of volcanoes, both active and extinct or dormant, including those of Orosí (5200 ft.), Rincón de la Vieja, Miravalles, Tenorio, Poas (8670 ft.), Barba, Turrialba (10,900 ft.), and Irazú, the loftiest (11,200 ft.), whose summit commands a view of both oceans. Irazú, or the volcano of Cartago, is freely active, and it has given rise to several destructive seismic disturbances. Earthquakes are frequent, and the town of Cartago has suffered complete or extensive effacement four times during the past century—in 1803, 1841, 1851, and 1854. Along the coast of the Pacific, especially around the Bay of Nicoya, the country has a beautiful and picturesque appearance, being diversified by valleys and intersected by numerous streams. Costa Rica contains some rich gold-mines, which are still worked. Silver and copper, with zinc, nickel, iron, lead, mercury, and coal, are also found here. In all parts of the republic, with the exception of the seacoasts, the climate is mild and temperate, never subject to excessive heat or cold, and rarely experiencing any other vicissitudes than those from the dry to the rainy season. It is therefore extremely well adapted to agricultural purposes, and capable of bringing to maturity many European plants, as well as most of those peculiar to the tropics. At San José, at an elevation of about 3700 ft., there is a perpetual spring, with a mean annual temperature of 68°, the temperature of December being 65.5° and of May 69°. The rainfall is, in places, very abundant, and much more on the Atlantic than on the Pacific side, ranging as high as 140 inches (Port Limón). Heavy and luxuriant forest covers a large part of the country, extending far up on the mountain slopes, and includes among its vegetable forms the mahogany, ebony, india-rubber, Brazil-wood, native cedar, oak (at elevations of 6000 ft. and over), myrtle, etc. The soil is remarkably fertile, especially on the table-lands and in the valleys between the mountains. Among the agricultural productions are coffee, bananas, cacao, Indian corn, tobacco, sugar, and wheat, the first two being the most important. In 1899, 33,800,000 pounds of coffee, with a valuation of nearly $3,000,000, and 2,960,000 bunches of bananas, valued at $1,200,000, were exported. The export of coffee in 1901 was 36,000,000 pounds, and of bananas nearly 3,900,000 bunches. The other exports are gold, hides, skins, cacao, dye-woods, sugar, etc. There is considerable pearl-fishing in the Gulf of Nicoya. The two ports of entry are Puntas Arenas, in the Gulf of Nicoya, and Port (or Puerto) Limón, on the Caribbean Sea, the latter being connected by rail with San José and Alajuela (117 miles).

The government of Costa Rica is liberal and is vested in a chief executive, the president of the republic (who is assisted by a cabinet of 4 ministers), and a national legislative body, or house of representatives, 1 representative in which is contributed by every 8000 inhabitants. The religion is Roman Catholic. Costa Rica is divided into 5 provinces and 2 districts. Capital, San José. Pop. estimated (1902) 317,000. Costa Rica formed part of the short-lived republic of the United States of Central America (1823-39), which was established at the time of the liberation of Mexico from Spanish rule. Its independence can hardly be said to have been fully established until 1848.

It has almost entirely lost its quaint mediæval appearance, but some old houses of the time of the Reformation still remain. Among the more remarkable buildings are St. Michael's church, a masterpiece of the lighter Gothic style, Trinity church, St. John's church, Christ church, a handsome modern building attached to the elegant spire of the Greyfriars' monastery, and St. Mary's hall, erected in the time of Henry VI. and esteemed one of the finest specimens of the ornamental architecture of that period. There is also a handsome Gothic Roman Catholic chapel. The charitable institutions are numerous and well endowed.

Coventry was early celebrated for its manufactures of cloth caps and bonnets and for a kind of blue thread called "Coventry true blue." Weaving and watch-making now constitute the staple business. Silk-dyeing is extensively carried on, and the town has been noted for its artistic metal-work as well as for its manufactures of bicycles and tricycles. Coventry was formerly surrounded with lofty walls, in which were 12 gates. Its pageants and processions were of the most magnificent description, and mysterics were here enacted in a style nowhere else equalled. The old predilection of the people of Coventry for gorgeous pageantry is still manifested by the triennial processional show in honor of Lady Godiva, who unwittingly tempted "Peeping Tom of Coventry" into the indiscretion for which he has been immortalized. Pop. in 1901, 69,978. Coventry returns 1 member to parliament.

Cracow, or Krakow, krá'kò (Pol. Kraków, krá'koov; Ger. Krakau, krá'kôw; L. Cracovia), a city of Austria-Hungary, in Galicia, formerly capital of the kingdom of Poland, situated in a broad plain on the left bank of the Vistula, 158 miles SSW. of Warsaw. Lat. 50° 4' N.; lon. 19° 52' E. It consists of the old town, the walls of which have been converted into promenades, of the castle quarter to the S., and of a number of suburbs. On the opposite bank of the river is the suburb of Podgórze. The Kasimiers quarter is inhabited mainly by Jews. Cracow, with its numerous steeples and turrets, presents externally a highly picturesque appearance. The splendid castle or palace, towering upon the banks of the Vistula, was for centuries the residence of the Polish kings. It was converted in the last century into barracks and a hospital. The grand old Gothic cathedral, adjoining the castle, contains the tombs of a long line of Polish kings and of some of the most distinguished sons of Poland. Its numerous chapels and crypt include a large array of beautiful sculptural monuments, including some by Thorwaldsen. Among the multitude of churches are a number of interesting mediæval edifices adorned with excellent works of art. The central public square is the Ring Square, on which stands the Cloth Hall, a quaint old building, recently restored. It contains the National (Polish) Museum. Close to it is the tower of the old town-hall. Another noteworthy structure is the new episcopal palace. In the western part of the city are the stately new buildings of the university. The university of Cracow (the so-called Jagellon University) boasts of being older than any of the universities in central Europe, with the exception of that of Prague, it having been projected in 1364 by Casimir the Great. In the fifteenth century it was one of the chief centres of learning in Europe. Its students number about 1700 and instruction is given in the Polish language. It has a library of 350,000 volumes, and connected with it are a botanical garden and an observatory. The Royal Academy of Sciences is an institution of a high order. The Czartoryski Museum contains a library of about 100,000 volumes and about 5000 MSS., and various collections. Cracow has recently been reconverted into a fortress by the construction of outlying forts. The town has manufactures of machinery, agricultural implements, chemicals, tobacco, etc. Close to the city is a mound more than 100 feet high, piled up nearly a century ago to commemorate the patriotic deeds of Kosciuszko. Another artificial tumulus preserves the memory of Krakus, a legendary Slavic chief, who is reputed to have founded the city about the year 700. Cracow was the capital of the kingdom of Poland down to the beginning of the seventeenth century, when the seat of government was transferred to Warsaw, and for 150 years longer it remained the coronation-city. From 1815 to 1846 it was the capital of the little Republic of Cracow, the last fragment of an independent Poland. The city is a great stronghold and focus of the Polish nationality. Pop. in 1900, 91,323.

Crete, kreet, or Candia, kan'de-a (anc. L. Cre'ta; Gr. Κρήνη; mod. Gr. Kriti, kree'te; Turk. Kirid, kee-reed'), a large island of the Mediterranean, previous to 1898 constituting a vilayet of Turkey, between lat. 34° 55' and 35° 43' N. and lon. 23° 30' and 26° 20' E. Length, 150 miles; breadth, from 6 to 35 miles. Area, together with that of some small islands, 3127 sq. m. The coasts are generally precipitous. The N. coast is deeply indented, among the bays or gulfs being those of Canea or Khania, Suda, Retimo (Bethymnon), Armyro, and Mirabella. The S. coast is broken by small indentations, the only large bay being that of Messara. Among the capes are those of Buss and Spada (Spatha), near the NW. extremity of the island, Cape Sidero, at the NE. end, and Cape Lithinos (or Mataba), the most southerly point. The surface is very mountainous. Among the few plains are those of Canea and Candia in the N. and Messara in the S. In the W. are the White mountains (Madaras), the loftiest in the island, attaining in Mount Theodoro an elevation of 8100 feet. In the centre is the group of mountains culminating in Mount Ida (Pelorit), 8060 ft. The Lassithi mountains in the E. rise to a height of about 7000 ft. above the sea. The streams of Crete are merely torrents. There are numerous caverns.

The climate is, in general, mild and healthy, the heats of summer being tempered by a N. wind which blows throughout the greater part of the day. Occasionally a fierce sirocco causes the mercury to rise to 100°. The only useful minerals known to exist are gypsum, lime, slate, and whetstone. Vegetation is extremely luxuriant in favorable situations, although a great portion of the soil is dry and stony and not well adapted for the production of grain. In many places, however, fruits and vegetables grow spontaneously, myrtles and rose-laurels cover the banks of the rivulets, and pastures are enamelled with the most beautiful and fragrant flowers. There are large olive woods, but the extent of forests is small. The principal products are olive oil, tobacco, oranges, lemons, silk, wine, raisins, carobs, valonia, flax, liquorice, wood, cotton, and honey. The manufactures are mostly domestic. The leading articles of export include olive oil, soap, carobs, raisins, wine, and almonds. The principal port is Khania. The population of Crete in 1900 was 609,349. The great bulk of the inhabitants belong to the Greek church, about 10 per cent. being Mohammedans. Almost the entire population, including the Mohammedans, is of Greek race. There are now hardly any Turks left in the island. The old Greek stock is supposed to be best preserved among the Sphakiotas, in the White mountains. Crete is an autonomous state, under Turkish suzerainty, governed by a high-commissioner of the Great Powers. There is a national assembly or chamber. The capital is Candia (Megalokastron).

In the time of Homer, Crete was crowded with inhabitants and contained a great number of flourishing cities. Among the cities founded by the Dorian Greeks were Cnosus, in the N., Cydonia, in the NW., and Gortyna, in the S. The Romans became masters of the island about 87 a.c. When the Latin Crusaders seized upon the Greek Empire, in 1204, Crete passed into the possession of Venice. The Turks wrested it from the Venetians, completing their conquest in 1669. There was a great rising of the Christians against the Turks in 1866-68. Another insurrection broke out in 1896, and in 1898 the Great Powers forced Turkey to evacuate the island.

Crimea, krim-ee' (Russ. Krim; anc. Taurica Chersonesus), a peninsula of Russia projecting into the Black Sea, forming the SW. enclosure of the Sea of Azov and comprising part of the government of Taurida. It is traversed by the parallel of 45° N. lat. Area, about 9900 sq. m. The narrow isthmus of Perekop connects it with the mainland to the N. The Strait of Yenikale or Kertch cuts it off from the mainland on the E. On the NE. is the shallow inlet of the Sea of Azov, known as the Sivash (or Putrid) Sea. The Crimea is separated into two distinct regions by its largest river, the Salghir. The NW. portion, which is much the larger of the two regions, is an extensive plain, a continuation of the steppes of south Russia, and its soil, impregnated with salt, is only fit for pasturage, great herds of cattle being reared upon it. The SE. portion is in great part hilly and mountainous, and is interspersed with beautiful meadows and fertile valleys. The Tauric Mountains skirt the SE. coast, attaining an elevation of 5060 feet. One of the highest peaks is the Tchatir-Dagh, or Tent Mountain (anc. Trepesus). The climate of the level plains of the Crimea is cold and humid in winter and hot and dry in summer. The SE. coast-land, protected against the north winds by its steep mountain-barrier, enjoys a mild winter and spring climate. This stretch of sunny coast, with its vineyards, olive-plantations, gardens, and villas, its background of forest-clad mountains, with the laurels, cypresses, and fig-trees growing at their bases, its profusion of resplendent flowering plants, and its relics of ancient cities and Mohammedan architecture, is the rival of the Italian Riviera. Here is situated the famous imperial seat of Livadia. The leading agricultural products of the Crimea are grain, tobacco, wine, and fruits. Its honey is celebrated. There are numerous small salt lakes, from which large quantities of salt are obtained. In addition to the Russians, who constitute the bulk of the population, the inhabitants include Tartars (of whom there are a great number), Greeks, Germans, Bulgarians, and Jews (the Karaites being here represented). The chief towns are Sebastopol, Simferopol, Kertch, Feodosia (Kaffa), Eupatoria (Koslov), Yalta, Karasubasar, and Bakhtehi-Sarai, the old residence of the Tartar khans. The Crimea was known to the ancient Greeks as the Tauric Chersonesus, or the peninsula of the Tauri, a barbarous race. The Greek kingdom of the Bosphorus existed here for centuries. In the thirteenth century the Tartars overran the region. The Genoese planted colonies on the coasts of the Crimea, the most flourishing of which was Kaffa. This greatemporium of the trade between Europe and Asia fell in 1475 into the hands of the Turks, who at this time made the Tartar khans of the Crimea vassals of the Sultan. The Turks had to relinquish their suzerainty in 1774, and in 1783 the peninsula was annexed to Russia. The Crimea was the principal seat of the conflict known as the Crimean or Eastern War, in which Turkey, England, France, and Sardinia were arrayed against Russia, and the crowning episode of which was the capture of Sevastopol by the allies in 1855.

(See CROATIA-SLAVONIA.) It extends northward from the Adriatic to the river Drave and is bounded W. and NW. by Istria, Carniola, and Styria, NE. by Hungary, E. by Slavonia, SE. by Turkish Croatia, and S. by Dalmatia. It is mainly a mountainous or hilly country. Its inhabitants are chiefly Croats, a Slavic people, who belong to the Catholic church. Their language is almost identical with that of the Serbs. They exhibit a strong national feeling and are restless under Hungarian domination. The chief town is Agram. The Croats settled in this region in the seventh century. In the tenth century their state rose to the rank of a kingdom, but they were unable to maintain their independence long in the face of the power of Hungary. In 1848, under their famous ban, Jellachich, they rose in arms against the Hungarians and, after the collapse of the Hungarian revolution, Croatia (together with Slavonia) was separated from Hungary down to the reorganization of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy in 1867-68.

TURKISH CROATIA, or the KRAINA, is the northwesternmost portion of Bosnia.

Croatia-Slavonia, a crown-land of Austria-Hungary, with the title of kingdom, included in Transleithania. Though attached to the Hungarian kingdom and represented in its diet, it has a diet of its own, with powers to regulate local affairs. It is bounded on the NW. by Carniola and Styria, on the NE. and E. by Hungary, from which it is separated by the Drave and Danube, on the S. by Servia, Bosnia, and Dalmatia (the Save forming a great part of the S. boundary), and SW. and W. by the Adriatic Sea and Istria. It consists of CROATIA, the larger half, in the W., and SLAVONIA, a wedge-shaped territory, included between the Drave, the Danube, and the Save, in the E. Area, 16,430 sq. m. Croatia-Slavonia is mainly a mountainous and hilly country. Slavonia is traversed by wooded offshoots of the southeastern Alps, whose greatest elevation is about 4000 feet above the sea. Along the Drave and Save are level plains. The southern part of Croatia includes a portion of the Cretaceous Alpine highlands, known as the Karst, remarkable for the peculiar configuration of their deep-cut valleys and their subterranean water-courses. The Croatian Karst presents the two mountain-ranges called the Velebit Planina and the Capela. The former, near the coast, attains an elevation of about 5700 feet. A wintry blast, called the bora, frequently sweeps down from the Karst and bursts upon the coast land with the violence of a hurricane. The country is, in general, a fertile region as well in the mountainous parts of Croatia as in the plains of Slavonia. The staple crops include wheat, maize, pulse, potatoes, flax, hemp, tobacco, etc. Much wine is produced and the plum-brandy, called Silbovits, is made in large quantities. Timber is an important product. Large numbers of cattle, horses, sheep, and swine are reared, the last-named being fattened in the oak-forests of Slavonia. The pop. at the close of 1900 was 2,416,304. Nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Croats and Serbs. About five per cent. are Germans and a still smaller number Hungarians. About three-fourths of the people are Roman Catholics, the remainder belonging mainly to the Greek Church. The inhabitants of Croatia-Slavonia are for the most part an agricultural people. Among the manufacturing industries carried on in a small way is the production of cotton and silk fabrics of exquisite texture. The capital is Agram. The governor of Croatia-Slavonia bears the title of ban.

It is the principal fortress and military port of Russia and the station of the Baltic fleet. Its defenses effectually close off approach from the sea to the capital. On the S. side of Kotlin is the narrow channel which large sea-going vessels have to take in coming up to the capital. All approaches to the town are barred by forts and batteries of the strongest description. The harbor consists of three sections,—the military or outer harbor; the middle harbor, for the fitting-out and repairing of vessels; and the innermost harbor, used only by merchant-vessels. Until recently vessels of large draught, bringing cargoes to St. Petersburg, were obliged to discharge at Cronstadt, but there is now a deep artificial channel which enables such ships to reach the capital. Much of the external commerce of Russia, however, still passes through Cronstadt. Ice blocks up the harbor five months in the year. When the surface has become firmly frozen over, cargoes are transported over the ice in sleds, an avenue being marked out by lines of poles and signal fires. Cronstadt has a large number of establishments and institutions of every kind connected with the naval service, including an arsenal, barracks, large ship-yards and repairing docks, school of marine engineering, etc. It has several handsome buildings, a park, and some fine public monuments. Cuba, kú'bē (Sp. pron. koo'ná), the largest of the West India Islands, until 1898 a possession of Spain, and now an independent republic, is situated at the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico, 130 miles S. of Florida (96 miles from Key West), from which it is separated by Florida Strait. On the E. it is separated from Haiti by the Windward Passage, 48 miles wide; on the S., from Jamaica, by a portion of the Caribbean Sea, 90 miles across; and on the W., from Yucatan, by the Yucatan Channel, 130 miles wide. It measures 730 miles in length along its axial line from E. to W. and varies in width from about 90 miles in the eastern part to less than 20 miles on the meridian of longitude a short distance W. of Havana. The extreme E. end of the island, Cape Maisí, is in lon. 74° 7' W., or almost due south of the city of New York; the W. end, Cape San Antonio, in lon. 84° 57' W. (a little westward of the meridian of Cincinnati); and the island extends from lat. 19° 48', near Cape Cruz, to 23° 13' N. Area, inclusive of the Isle of Pines and the very numerous keys, about 43,500 sq. m. The coast-line, with its main indentations, measures upward of 2000 miles in length, and for most of the island's contour is abrupt and precipitous. On the E. it presents a series of superimposed terraces, rising to 600 feet or more, and representing so many stages in the elevation of the land out of the sea. The coasts are in general exceedingly foul, presenting reefs and shallows which extend from 2 to 2½ miles into the sea and make the approach both difficult and dangerous. Within these reefs there is often a good sandy beach; but for a large part of the circumference of the island there is a belt or zone of lowland very little raised above the level of the sea, subject to floods and inundations, rendering communication between the interior and the sea difficult in the rainy season. There are, however, good harbors and bays on all the coasts, including Havana, one of the finest harbors in the West Indies; Guantánamo, Santiago de Cuba, Manzanillo, and Bahía de Jagua or Xagua (Ciempuegos), on the S. coast; Bahía Honda and Cabañas, on the NW. coast; and Baracoa, Nipe, Cabañico, Padre, Nuevitas, Cardenas, Matanzas, etc., on the N. and NE. coasts.

The greater part of the island is traversed by mountain-ranges of more or less continuity, whose trend conforms in great measure to the insular axis or the immediate coast. Among the better known of these mountains are the Sierra de los Organos (Organ Mountains) in the W., extending through the province of Pinar del Rio to the neighborhood of Havana, with the Pan de Guajabón, 2530 feet in elevation; the Sierra Cabitas; and the Sierra Maestra, which dominates the coast of the province of Santiago and culminates in the precipitous Pico Turquino, about 8400 ft. in height, the loftiest summit of the island. Other well-known peaks are the Gran Piedra, about 5200 ft., and the Cerro de Oro, 3300 ft. The eastern section of the Maestra chain, which has its continuation in the mountains of the northern peninsula of Haiti, is known as the Sierra del Cobre, or Copper Mountains, named from the deposits of this metal which it contains. A prominent topographic feature is the "Anvil" (Yunque) of Baracoa, 1825 ft. in height. Towards the middle of the island the mountains drop down to undulating knolls or even entirely disappear, the line of the historic trocha being a low marshy depression about 45 miles in width, which connects Morón on the N. with the S. coast. The dominant Cuban mountains are constructed of Jurassic, Cretaceous, and Tertiary sandstones, conglomerates, and limestones, with vast volcanic and dioritic intrusions, and are flanked in part by Pliocene and more recent benches, some of them recent coral reefs. Nuclear granitic rocks are present in many parts.

There are no very large rivers in Cuba, the largest being the Cauto, which discharges into the Manzanillo bight and has a length of some 250 miles, about one-half of which is navigable for small craft; the Sasa; the Hatiguanico, which drains the large swamps (ciénegas) lying N. of the Zapata peninsula; and the Sagua la Grande, a stream of the N. coast, discharging in lon. 80° W.

Climate and Productions.—The climate of Cuba is essentially tropical, hot and dry during the greater part of the year. The mean temperature of the lowland ranges from about 77° (Havana) to 82.5° (Santiago de Cuba); in the interior highlands the temperature is considerably lower. The hottest months, July and August (or September), do not give a greater average than 83°; and the coldest, December and January, present the mean of 72°. In summer the thermometer seldom rises above 86°, and in winter rarely falls so low as 50°. Rain often descends in torrents from July to September, and occasional showers fall for a month or two before and after these periods. The annual rainfall varies, according to the situation, from 40 to nearly 160 inches. No snow is known ever to fall on the lowland. The vegetation of Cuba is exceedingly luxuriant. Forests of mahogany, ebony, cedar, fustic, and other useful woods abound; and the fields are covered with flowers and odoriferous plants. The royal palm is a magnificent type of Cuban vegetation. The principal cereal cultivated is Indian corn. Rice is also produced in considerable quantities, and there is some cultivation of cotton, cacao, and indigo; but the principal crops which figure in commerce are sugar, tobacco, and coffee. A considerable extent of country is appropriated to cattle-breeding, and to farms on which are raised vegetables, maize, mallochia grass, cassava, onions, garlic, poultry, wax, and honey. The principal fruits of the island are oranges, pineapples, shaddock, plantains, bananas, melons, lemons, and sweet limes, figs and strawberries are also to be had. The valleys of Cuba are famed for their beauty and fertility and are exquisitely lovely in their scenic surroundings. Of these probably none surpasses the Yumuri, watered by a stream of the same name which discharges into Matanzas Bay. The quantity of sugar produced in Cuba in the years 1897-1900 was about 300,000 tons annually, but in the year 1894-95 the product had reached 1,004,000 tons. In 1901 the production was 600,000 tons, and in 1902, 850,000 tons. The bulk of the sugar exports goes to the United States, the value of the shipments thither in 1901 having exceeded $30,000,000. The unsettled condition of the country has naturally affected the agricultural as well as all other industries. About 47 per cent. of the entire cultivated area of the island is planted in sugar-cane, chiefly in the provinces of Santa Clara and Matanzas. The tobacco interests rank immediately after those of sugar and give the wealth to the province of Pinar del Rio. The best tobacco is grown in the district of Vuelta de Abajo, a little W. of Havana, about 84 miles in length and 21 in breadth; and here the mildest and finest flavored is produced on the banks of the San Sebastián, most of which is made into cigars, celebrated under the name of Havana cigars. The tobacco crop for the year 1899-1900 amounted to 460,000 bales of 110 pounds each, the export to the United States alone being valued at $9,700,000. The tobacco exports in 1902 were: leaf-tobacco, 34,300,000 pounds; cigars, 208,000,000 (in number); and cigarettes, 11,500,000 packets. Coffee-planting, which was at one time a leading industry, has entirely fallen off in importance. While in the first quarter of the nineteenth century Cuba exported more coffee than Java, its present production (about 130,000 bags) is less than a hundredth of that of the entire world, and hardly sufficient to meet the demands of the island.

Animals.—The Cuban fauna is characterized more by negative than by positive characters, and shows the effects of long-continued isolation or insularity. Exclusive of bats, there are only two indigenous mammals, the agouti or cavy and the peculiar insectivore Solenodon. The domestic quadrupeds have been introduced. Birds are numerous, comprising forms that are tropicopolitan in habit and many migrants from the United States. There are no venomous serpents; the boa, iguana, and crocodile may be taken to represent the types of the Reptilia. Fossil mammalian remains found in various cave-deposits would seem to indicate a not improbable union during middle Tertiary and still later times between the island and Central America and Florida.

Mineral Resources.—The chief metallic resource of Cuba is iron-ore, the most important mining centre of which is located in the Sierra Maestra, near Santiago de Cuba and Juragua. Rich deposits of manganese occur in nearly the same region, and in the Sierra del Cobre are located what were at one time the largest producers of copper in the world. In the second quarter of the past century upward of $3,000,000 worth of copper was shipped to the United States annually. These mines are now in greater part abandoned. The exportation of iron-ore to the United States is about 50,000 tons per month. Asphaltum, obtained in largest quantity in the Bay of Cardenas and in the vicinity, and salt are important products. Gold and silver appear to occur only sparingly.

Inhabitants, Government.—About two-thirds of the inhabitants are Spanish-speaking whites, of whom about one-tenth are natives of Spain. The planters are generally of Spanish descent. The laboring class is composed mainly of the late slaves of African blood and their descendants. There are a considerable number of Chinese coolies. Education is in an exceedingly backward condition, the system of government under the rule of Spain having been of the most illiberal character. In 1899 64 per cent. of the population were unable to read. New educational measures were put into force in June, 1900, during the occupancy of the island by the United States, and important advances are expected. The University of Havana, with faculties of letters, sciences, medicine, pharmacy, and law, was attended in 1901 by about 600 students. The seat of government is at Havana, the chief city. The chief-magistrate is a president (elected for a term of 4 years), who is assisted by a cabinet of 6 members. The legislative body consists of a senate and a house of representatives. The present constitution was adopted in Feb., 1901. Communication in the interior of Cuba is still difficult, owing to the wretched condition of the roads. There were in 1900 about 1100 miles of railroads in operation. The island is divided into the six provinces of Havana, Matanzas, Pinar del Rio, Puerto Principe, Santa Clara, and Santiago, giving a total population (in 1899) of 1,572,797. The most populous city is Havana, which in 1902 had an estimated population of about 275,000. The second city is Santiago de Cuba, with a population of 43,000.

History.—Cuba was discovered by Columbus during his first voyage in 1492. About 20 years later the settlement by the Spaniards was begun. The Indians were soon reduced to subjection, and under the relentless treatment of their task-masters they were speedily exterminated. Negroes took their place as slaves. The island prospered economically under Spanish rule, but the oppressive and arbitrary sway of the captains-general became intolerable. In 1868 the friends of Cuban independence rose in arms, and for ten years carried on unrelenting warfare with the Spaniards, the war being chiefly confined to the eastern extremity of the island; but in 1878 the patriots laid down their arms, the Spanish authorities offering terms of great liberality and promising great reforms. In 1880 an act for the abolition of slavery was passed by the Spanish Cortes. A second war for independence, beginning in 1895, and the armed intervention of the United States, resulted in 1898 in the complete emancipation of the island from Spanish sovereignty. This was followed by the establishment of a national Cuban government.

Its cathedral and Augustine convent are among the finest edifices in South America; and there are a mint, hospitals, collegiate schools, and a university (founded in 1692). It is a bishop's see. Its Dominican convent occupies the site of a famous Peruvian Temple of the Sun, and many massive specimens of ancient Peruvian architecture are extant in and around the city. On its N. side are remains of a vast fortress of a cyclopean kind, and traces remain of a magnificent road extending hence to Lima, 350 miles distant. The city has some manufactures of cotton and woollen stuffs, leather, embroidery, etc., and considerable cattle and agricultural interests.

Cuzco is the most ancient of the Peruvian cities, having been founded, according to tradition, about 1020 (1050?), by Manco Capac, the first Inca of Peru. It was taken by Pizarro, who was surprised at the grandeur and magnificence it exhibited. Its streets were then large, wide, and straight, and its shrines, palaces, and temples were richly adorned with ornaments of gold and silver. While still in possession of Pizarro, it was besieged by the Peruvians and a great part of it destroyed. Pop. about 30,000.

Cyprus, ai'pris (Turk. Kıbrıs, kee'breese'; Gr. Kύπρος), an island of the Levant, in the Mediterranean, near the mouth of the Gulf of Iskanderun, 44 miles S. of Cape Anamur, in Anatolia, and 60 miles W. of Latakia, in Syria, with which it is connected by cable. Cape St. Andreas, its NE. extremity, which is at the end of a long narrow peninsula, is in lat. 35° 41' 42" N., lon. 34° 36' 30" E. Area, 3584 sq. m. The island nominally forms part of the Turkish Empire, but is virtually a British possession, governed by a British high-commissioner. It is about 148 miles in length with a general width of 40-50 miles. Its surface is constituted by a low-lying central and exceedingly fertile plain, the Mesoreia or Messaria, and of a northern and a southern littoral mountain-range, the former having summits (Buffavento, Pentadaktulos, Koronos) rising to 2500-3150 feet, and the latter (the Olympics) culminating in the Troodos, 6406 feet, the highest elevation of the land. The central plain and northern mountains are of comparatively recent origin. The prevailing formation of the mountains in the N. division is limestone. The S. portion of the mountains, seemingly of Achaean age, yields asbestos, gypsum, red jasper, copper, and some gold and silver. The copper-mines were once important; and the modern name of that metal is derived from the word Cyprus.

Cyprus is deficient in water, its streams being chiefly mountain-torrents which dry up in summer. The only permanent river of importance is the Pedias (anc. Pedisus), which waters the valley of Nicosia, flows E., and discharges at Famagusta. A second stream coursing in the same direction is the Idalia or Yaliss. The climate is in general healthy, but some sections, particularly of the S. coast, are malarial. The mountains of Cyprus are still in part covered with vast forests of excellent timber, almost exclusively conifers. The island is esteemed the richest and most fertile in the Levant, although it has few level tracts of country, those around Nicosia, Famagusta, Larnaca, Limasol, and Baffo (Paphos) being the chief. Agriculture is in a backward state. Cotton, wheat, barley, and tobacco of good quality are grown; madder, flax, sesamum, and the poppy are raised in numerous localities. Silk is produced abundantly. Wine is the most noted production of the island and is of excellent quality. The commoner cultivated fruits are the orange, citron, date, and fig. Cyprus is famed in the East for its fine mules. Many camels are also bred. Among the indigenous animals is the moufflon or wild sheep. The island has at different times suffered from devastation by locusts.

Manufacturing is carried on to some extent. Salt, in large quantities, is obtained from salines at Limasol and Larnaca. The native textile industries comprise the making of embroideries, silk nettings, and various forms of cotton, woollen, and linen fabrics. Good morocco leather is made at Nicosia.

The principal towns of Cyprus are Nicosia (Levkasia), the capital, near the centre of the island, and Limasol and Larnaca (anc. Oitium), the two principal ports, both on the S. coast. The seaport of Famagusta, on the E. coast, near the site of the ancient Salamis, was formerly important.

Originally peopled by the Phoenicians and afterwards colonised by the Greeks, Cyprus was by the latter people dedicated to Venus, whose most celebrated temple was at Paphos. The island belonged successively to the Assyrians, the Persians (under whom the cities enjoyed a great measure of autonomy), the Egyptians, the Romans, and the Byzantines. It was one of the first places, out of Palestine, that received the gospel. In the time of the Crusades it was taken from the Mohammedans by Richard I. of England, and given by him to the princes of the Lusignan family. After belonging to Venice for a century, it was conquered by the Turks in 1571. In 1878 it was conveyed by treaty to Great Britain, the sultan retaining the sovereignty of the island and receiving an annual payment of money in place of its revenues.

Since the discovery of rich and abundant remains of antiquity in the island, increased interest has been taken in its eventful though somewhat obscure history. Its antiquities have special importance as illustrating some stages of the early history of sculpture and the kindred arts. Pop. in 1901, 237,022, of whom 183,739 belonged to the Greek church and 51,309 were Mohammedans.

Dahomey, dā-ho'me, officially Dahomé, dā'ho-mā', a former negro kingdom of western Africa, on the coast of Guinea, now a French possession. It lies between German Togoland on the W. and the British possessions of Lagos and Yoruba on the E., and extends with its hinterland to the Niger River on the N. It has a width on the coast of 70 miles. Area, about 58,000 sq. m. Pop. estimated to be 1,000,000. Nearly the whole coast region is composed of islands and swamps, separated by lagoons and channels, affording extensive navigation. The country is in general fertile and well cultivated, especially in the neighborhood of the towns and villages. On the coast, particularly, there are many farms in a high state of cultivation and the houses are clean and comfortable. The chief crops raised are Indian corn, yams, and the manioc-root, which forms a principal article of food. Other products are palm oil, Shea butter, and cotton.

Dahomey, though generally level or but slightly and gradually rising from the coast, has several mountain-ranges and hilly tracts in the interior. Springs and rivulets are numerous, but there are no rivers of magnitude. Forest trees, including the baobab and numerous species of palms, attain magnificent dimensions, and are interspersed with fruit trees of various kinds, including the tamarind, yellow fig, cashew, kola, and cocoanut. The wild animals include the lion, hyena, leopard, elephant, hippopotamus, various species of monkey, etc.

The Dahomans are all pagans and worshippers of fetiches. The sovereign power was until recently absolute, extending to an entire control over the lives and properties of the people, who invested their king with the attributes of deity, believing him to be superior to all human wants and infirmities. Under this influence the most fearful atrocities were perpetrated, wholesale murders having formed the principal and most acceptable part of the state and religious ceremonies. The people generally are intelligent and ceremoniously affable; they are good agriculturists and potters. In times of war they are fierce and wildly aggressive. The last ruler of Dahomey, whose official seat was at Abomey, was deposed in 1900 by the French, and interned at Porto Novo, the present capital of the region. His predecessor, King Behanzin, surrendered in 1894, and is now interned at Fort-de-France, in the island of Martinique. Settlements of importance, besides those already named, are Kotonu, which is in telegraphic communication with Abomey and the Nigerian and Senegal tracts, Grand Popo, Whydah, Agné, Allada, Kassa, and Sayi.

Dalles, dáls, or The Dalles, the capital of Wasco co., Oregon, on the S. bank of the Columbia River, about 200 miles from its mouth and 90 miles by land E. of Portland. It has an extensive trade in wool, salmon, grain, fruit, and live-stock. The navigation of the Columbia River is here obstructed by rapids, called the Dalles of the Columbia, the stream for upward of two miles being contracted into a channel 130-200 feet wide between cliffs of basaltic rock. The tempestuous course of the river, with the imposing setting to its channel of erosion, is a most attractive piece of scenery. A railway (Oregon Railroad and Navigation Co.), 14 miles long, extends from this point to Celilo and connects the navigable parts of the river. Pop. in 1900, 3542.

Dalles of the St. Louis, a series of fine cataracts in the St. Louis River, near Duluth, Minn. The river descends 400 feet in 4 miles.

Dalmatia, dal-má'she-q (It. Dalmazia, däl-má'tse-á; Ger. Dalmatien, däl-má'tse-en), a crown-land and titular kingdom of Austria-Hungary, in Cisleithania. It consists of a long narrow tract of mountainous country and a number of large islands along the NE. coast of the Adriatic Sea. It is bounded N. by Croatia, NE. and E. by Bosnia and Herzegovina, and SE. by Montenegro. It extends from the arm of the Adriatic Sea called the Quarnero, in lat. 44° 53' N., to Spizza, in lat. 42° 6', and has an area of 4940 sq. m. In breadth it is very limited, not exceeding 40 miles in any part, and at the narrowest, near Ragusa, about 2 miles. It has on its eastern border the Velebit mountains and the Dinaric Alps, with summits rising to 5500-6000 feet (Trogglav, 6275 ft.; Dinara, 6005 ft.); and further south, the mountains of Cattaro, with the Orjen rising to 6160 ft. Along the coast stretches a barren chain of mountains, in which are the peaks of Mosor, 4364 ft., and further SE., Biocovo, 5780 ft. The interior of Dalmatia is diversified by undulatory ground, hills, and high mountains,—many of the latter having the same rugged barren aspect as those of the coast. The principal rivers, all of them with short courses, are the Narenta, in the S., the Zermagna, Kerka, and Cetina. Many of the waters are enourishing. The country is not rich in metals, although in ancient times it produced large quantities of gold. Iron, lignite, asphalt, and salt are obtained.

The coast is indented with numerous harbors and bays, the principal of which are Cattaro, Ragusa, Spalato, and Sebenico. A vast number of islands—Pago, Brassa, Lesina, Cursola—stretch along the shores. Their severance from the main-land has been brought about by subsidence and erosion. Most of these are valuable for their productions, such as timber, wine, oil, cheese, honey, salt, and asphalt, and in several of them ship-building is carried on. The climate generally is warmer than that of any other part of Austria-Hungary, and in spring the sirocco is felt. The mean annual temperature of the coast is about 59°.

A large part of the land is in pasture and wood. The principal agricultural productions are Indian corn, rye, barley, figs, olives, and grapes. Much wine is exported, largely for the purpose of adulteration with other red wines. Dalmatia is famed for its Maraschino liqueur. The fruits include the apple, pear, plum, almond, peach, apricot, lemon, orange, carob, and pomegranate. Comparatively few sheep or cattle are reared; horses are rare and of diminutive size. Dalmatia has hardly any manufactures. The population in 1900 was 591,597. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Serbo-Croats. The people of this race inhabiting Dalmatia, especially the inhabitants of the interior, are known as Morlaks. The non-Slavic element, which is but a small fraction of the population, consists mainly of Italians (dwellers in the towns), who number about 20,000. The prevailing religion is the Roman Catholic. One-sixth of the inhabitants belong to the Greek church. Education is very generally diffused by the system of national schools. Principal towns are Zara (the capital), Spalato, and Ragusa.

Dalmatia was conquered by the Romans in the time of Augustus. In the seventh century it was occupied by the Slavs. In the course of the Middle Ages the greater part of it was united to Hungary and most of the remainder passed under the sway of Venice. Ragusa was for centuries the seat of an independent republic. In 1797 the Venetian portion, the modern Dalmatia, together with the bulk of the dominions of Venice, passed to Austria; but in 1805 Dalmatia fell into the hands of Napoleon, who first united it to the kingdom of Italy and subsequently to the kingdom of Illyria. The events of 1814 brought Dalmatia again under Austrian rule.

Dalmatia, dal-má'she-q, a post-village of Northumberland co., Pa., 18 miles S. of Sunbury, on the Northern Central R. Pop. about 460.

Damariscotta Mills, a post-village of Lincoln co., Me., on the E. bank of the Damariscotta River and on the Maine Central R., 9 miles ENE. of Wiscasset. Pop. 300.

Damariscotta River, Me., a narrow inlet of the sea, extending into Lincoln co. It is nearly 22 miles long.

Damascoville, Columbiana co., Ohio. See DAMASCUS.

Damascus (Hebrew, Dammesek; Arab. Dimishk' ash-Sham, or simply Zah-Sham), a city of Asiatic Turkey, capital of the vilayet of Syria, beautifully situated on a plain, at the E. base of the Anti-Libanus range, about 180 miles S. by W. of Aleppo. Lat. 33° 27' N.; lon. 36° 25' E. Elevation above the sea, about 2300 feet. It is connected by rail with Beirut, and a line to Mecca is in course of construction. It is 6 miles in circumference and is surrounded by a dilapidated wall with towers. Its appearance, when it first opens on the view, is impressive. The Arabs regard it as one of their four terrestrial paradises. The plain on which it stands is covered with beautiful gardens and orchards, irrigated by the limpid waters of the Barada, forming a grove of more than 60 miles in circuit. But the interior of Damascus by no means corresponds with the beauty of its environs or with the entrancing picture which it presents as a whole with its cupolas and minarets. The streets are narrow, and have, many of them, a gloomy and dilapidated look. The houses generally have a mean appearance externally, most of them presenting only gray mud walls to the streets. In many of them, however, a singular contrast is presented between the plain outer walls and the richness within. Those of the more wealthy have beautifully paved courts, ornamented with fountains, flowers, and orange, lemon- and pomegranate-trees. The Christian and Jewish quarters are miserable.

Among the places most worthy of notice are the numerous bazaars, generally designated by the name of some particular trade or commodity, which are merely long streets covered in with high wood-work and lined with shops, stalls, warehouses, and cafés. In the midst of the bazaars stands the khan of Asad Pasha, said to be one of the most magnificent structures of this kind in the East. Here wholesale merchants carry on their business. The so-called Mosque of the Ommedi, erected early in the eighth century, whose walls were reared in part upon those of a Christian church (itself probably the successor of a heathen temple) figures in Arabic literature as one of the wonders of the world. It was partially destroyed by fire in 1893, but is being restored in its former splendid style. There are in all about 250 mosques and Mohammedan schools. The citadel is an extensive and massive square structure. The baths of Damascus are noted for their elegance, and the cafés enjoy an equal reputation. The streets and bazaars of the city, with their bustle and many-colored costumes, exhibit Oriental life in its most picturesque aspects.

Damascus is one of the holy cities of the Mohammedans, and here the pilgrims assemble on their journey to Mecca and separate on their return from it. It was long the proud emporium of the trade of the Levant, but the altered conditions of traffic since the rise of Alexandria and the construction of the Suez Canal have robbed the city of much of its commercial importance, and its caravan trade is but a shadow of what it was in former days. The inhabitants of Damascus excel in the manufacture of the finished products of Oriental handicraft. The city is noted for its gold- and silver-embroidered stuffs, its metal-ware and jewelry, its fine inlaid cabinet-work, and its saddles and bridles. Fabrics of silk and of silk and cotton mixed are extensively produced. The manufacture of Damascus blades, for which the city was once so celebrated, no longer exists. Its plums and grapes are famous, and rose-water is distilled from its roses. The population numbers about 150,000, about one-fourth being non-Mohammedans. The Christians, who outnumber the Jews, belong mainly to the Greek and United Greek (Melchite) sects. There are a number of Christian schools. Until recently no Christian could walk the streets of the city without incurring the risk of being maltreated. In July, 1860, the Mohammedans slaughtered thousands of Christians.

The existence of Damascus as a city dates back to the dawn of history. In the period of the early Jewish kings it was the seat of a kingdom, which was at the height of its power in the ninth century B.C. It was a flourishing place under the Romans. In A.D. 661 it became the capital of the Ommiad caliphs, but in the middle of the following century was supplanted by Bagdad.—Adj. and inhab. DAMASCUS, dām'-sēen'.

Damascus, a post-hamlet of Placer co., Cal., 18 miles from Colfax.

Damgarten, dām'gar'ten, a town of Prussia, in Pomerania, 25 miles W. of Stralsund. Pop. about 1700.

Damghan, dām'gān', a decayed town of Persia, in Khorassan, 50 miles S. of Astrabad, at the northern foot of the Elbrus mountains. Pop. about 15,000.

Damiansville, a post-village of Clinton co., Ill., 22 miles E. of Belleville. Pop. 100.

Damietta, dām-e-et'tā (Arab. Dumyat'), a town of Egypt, on the E. branch of the Nile, about 8 miles from its mouth, close to Lake Menzaleh, 113 miles by rail N. by E. of Cairo. Previous to the modern resurrection of Alexandria it was a place of great commercial importance and a flourishing industrial centre. It presents externally a stately appearance, but within is in great part dilapidated. A bar at the harbor does not admit of the entrance of vessels of large draft. Its trade is small, but the manufacture of cotton and silk fabrics is busily carried on. The town is situated a few miles from the old Damietta (anc. Tamiathis), which figured in the Crusades and was given up in the thirteenth century in favor of the new site. Pop. in 1897, 31,515 (commune, 43,500), chiefly native Mohammedans.

Dan'ube (anc. Danu'bius and Is'ter; Ger. Donau, dō'nōw; Hun. Duna, doo'nōh), the largest river in Europe after the Volga, formed by the union at Donaueschingen of two streams, the Breg and the Brigach, which rise in the eastern slope of the Black Forest, in lat. 48° 6' N., lon. 8° 9' E., 2225 feet above sea-level. Its general course is from W. to E., and it falls into the Black Sea by three mouths,—viz., the Kilis, Edrillis or St. George's, and Sulina. The last, which is the deepest and has been much improved by the construction of jetties, opens into the sea in lat. 45° 9' N., lon. 29° 40' E. The extent of its basin is about 309,000 sq. m.; the distance from source to mouth in a direct line, 1000 miles, but including windings, about 1800. From its source it flows in a general easterly direction (passing Ulm, Ratisbon, Passau, Linz, Vienna, Pressburg, and Gran) till it reaches Waltzen, in Hungary; there it turns and flows S. (passing Budapest) to Vukovar, in Slavonia; from Vukovar it flows in a general southeasterly direction to its mouth, passing in its course Belgrade, Orsova, Vidin, Nikopoli, Kustohuk, Silistria, Braila, Galatz, and Ismail, and forming between Belgrade and Orsova the boundary between Hungary and Serbia, and from Orsova to Silistria the boundary between Rumania and Bulgaria. Below the Pruth its N. bank is Russian, and on the S. is the Dobruja, now a part of Rumania. The average fall of the Danube is 15 inches per mile. It is joined in its course by over 100 large tributaries, of which about 35 are navigable. Among the principal tributaries on the right are the Iller, Lech, Isar, Inn, Enns, Raab, Drave, Save, and Morava; on the left, the Altmühl, Regen, March, Waag, Theiss, Temes, Aluta, Sereth, and Pruth. At Ulm the Danube becomes navigable for flat-bottomed boats of 100 tons. Between Orsova, in Hungary, and Gladova, in Serbia, the navigation was formerly effectually stopped by the rapids of the famous gap called the Iron Gate. The chief obstacles to navigation at this point have been removed and a lateral canal constructed, and the river was formally declared open for navigation on Sept. 27, 1896. The improvements in the river also comprise important regulation-works in the city of Vienna. Above Orsova the rapidity of the current is so great as to render navigation, save by steam, impossible; below that point the flow is gentle and equable. The Danube is placed in communication with other waters by means of the Ludwigs-kanal, which affords a connection with the Rhine (see ALTMÜHL), and of the Schwarzenberg-Holtschweim and Béga canals (the last in Hungary). Although not especially noted for its scenery, the upper course of the stream is exceedingly picturesque, and the passage across the lowlands of Hungary is markedly interesting.

Danzig, dánt'sis, in English commonly written Dantzic (Pol. Gdańsk, g'dáńsk; L. Geda'nium), a city of Prussia, capital of a governmental district of its own name and of the province of West Prussia, is situated on the left bank of the Danzig arm of the Vistula, about 4 miles above its entrance into the Bay of Danzig (Baltic Sea). The Vistula is here joined by the Motlau, which traverses the city in 2 arms, forming the Speicherinsel, or Granary Island, and receives the little stream Radaune. Lat. (observatory)  $54^{\circ} 21' 18''$  N.; lon.  $18^{\circ} 39' 52''$  E. The city is nearly of a circular form, the more modern quarters being on the right bank of the Motlau. There are about 50 bridges in the various sections of the city. Danzig still retains part of its old walls. One of its gates, the Hohe Thor, or High Gate, in the style of a Roman triumphal arch, is a magnificent specimen of sixteenth century architecture. An extensive system of fortifications has recently been constructed. Few cities in Germany present so quaint an aspect or reflect the spirit of the past so vividly as Danzig, with its narrow streets, lined with stately houses, whose tall gabled façades are often richly ornamented. The Langgasse (Long Street) and the Langer Markt together constitute the finest thoroughfare, which is full of beautiful old structures. Here stands the interesting mediæval town hall. Near by is the exchange, a building used in former ages as a meeting-place for the aristocratic young men of the city, in front of which is the splendid Neptune Fountain. The principal ecclesiastical edifices is the imposing church of St. Mary, containing fine works of art. Other conspicuous edifices are the new building of the Landtag, or provincial assembly, of West Prussia, the savings-bank, the municipal museum, formerly a Franciscan convent, and the new synagogue. The municipal library contains about 120,000 volumes.

The improvements recently made in the beds of the Vistula and Motlawa enable large sea-going vessels to come up to the quays of Danzig. The town possesses an outer port, Neufahrwasser, at the mouth of the Vistula. Here a free port for Danzig was created in 1899. The commerce of the city is very extensive, but it no longer holds the position which it held before the introduction of railways, when it was the great outlet of the productions of Poland. Its principal trade is in grain, timber, and sugar. There are great government establishments here for the manufacture of arms and ammunition. Ship-building is carried on, and connected with the ship-yards are foundries and machine-shops. Among the important industries are sugar-refining, distilling, and the manufacture of chemicals, vinegar, mineral waters, paper, and the liquor called Goldwasser.

Mention is made of the town of Danzig as early as the close of the tenth century. In 1310 it came into the possession of the Teutonic Knights, who held it for a century and a half, in the course of which it rose to be a great emporium of trade. It was one of the leading members of the Hanseatic League. On the cession of West Prussia by the Teutonic Knights to Poland, Danzig was permitted to enjoy an independent existence, with the possession of a considerable district, under Polish protection. In the second partition of Poland, in 1793, the city passed into the possession of Prussia. It suffered greatly in the Napoleonic wars. Pop. in 1890, 120,459; in 1900, 140,529.

Danzig (or Dantzic), Gulf of, an inlet of the Baltic, indenting the coast of Prussia (provinces of East and West Prussia). It is about 50 miles in breadth at its entrance. The Frische Nehrung, a long narrow tongue of land on the SE., cuts off the lagoon called the Frische Haff, which receives two arms of the Vistula (one arm emptying into the gulf further to the W.) and the waters of the Pregel. The principal town on the gulf is Pillau. Danzig is a few miles from its shores.

Dardanelles, dar'da-néiz, or Hell'spont (anc. Hellepontus), a narrow strait between Europe and Asia, connecting the Sea of Marmora and the arm of the Mediterranean known as the Ægean Sea, having SE. Asia Minor and NW. the peninsula of Gallipoli. Length, from NE. to SW., 40 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 4 miles. The Asiatic side presents most beautiful scenery and rises gradually from the sea upward to the range of Mount Ida. The European side is, in general, steep and rugged. Various inlets form secure harbors for vessels of every size, and on both shores there are numerous forts and batteries, the modern fortifications being on a great scale. There is a double current in the strait, an upper current flowing from the Sea of Marmora and a lower current flowing from the Ægean Sea. The modern name of this strait is derived from the castles called the Dardanelles, situated on its banks at the narrowest part, that on the Asiatic side, Tohanak-Kalesi, called the castle of Asia, being near the site of the ancient Dardanus. Its ancient name, Hellepont (i.e., "Sea of Helle"), was bestowed with reference to Helle, daughter of Athamas, King of Thebes, who was fabled to have been drowned in it. By an agreement between the Great Powers the Dardanelles are closed to non-Turkish vessels of war.

Darfur, dar'foor' (i.e., "Country of the Furs"), a country of Egyptian Sudan, lying between Kordofan and Wadai, and forming part of the Egyptian dominions since 1875. Its limits are ill-defined, and but little is known positively regarding the characteristics of the country. It is in great part a plateau of 2000-2500 feet elevation, with fertile oases, and rising in a well-defined and richly watered mountain-mass or highland, the Marrah, of igneous or granitic construction, to 6000-7000 feet elevation. There are a number of more or less continuous streams, but in many parts water is obtainable only from wells. The heat in Darfur is excessive, and there are, properly speaking, only three seasons in the year,—spring, summer, and autumn. July-September is the season of the rains, which continue 75 days. The crops chiefly cultivated are millet, rice, maize, sesamum, and legumes. Among the fruit trees are the tamarind, orange, citron, and date. Tobacco abounds, and is much used by the natives; cotton is also cultivated.

The inhabitants, chiefly Furs (or Fors), are a mixture of Arabs and negroes, though many individuals of both races still retain their peculiar physical characteristics. Education is little attended to, and is confined to learning to read the Koran, and that by the male children only. The religion is Mohammedanism. As a result of its position, the commerce of Darfur is chiefly inland; but this is very considerable. Its principal intercourse is with Egypt, carried on by means of caravans. There is also considerable trade with Mecca. Cattle constitute the chief wealth of the country. Capital, El-Fasher.

The country was for 400 years ruled by a line of absolute sovereigns, the last of whom was defeated and slain by the Egyptian army of conquest in 1874. Since 1899 Darfur has been under Anglo-Egyptian domination. The population is variously estimated at from 1,500,000 to 4,000,000, mostly speaking a dialect of the Arabic.

Ma're Mortuum* and Mare Salis), called in Scripture Salt Sea, Sea of the Plain, and East Sea, a salt lake near the S. extremity of Palestine. Its northern end is about 25 miles E. of Jerusalem. Length, from N. to S., about 46 miles; breadth at the widest part, 9½ miles. The basin or hollow in which the Dead Sea reposes forms part of the great depression through which the Jordan flows, that river entering it at its northern extremity. The surface of the lake (which has fluctuations amounting to several yards) is about 1300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean Sea, being the most depressed accessible portion of the earth's surface. This trough has a continuation southward in the valley called El-Arabah, which extends to the Gulf of Akabah, in the Red Sea. The depth of the lake in the deepest portion is about equal to the depression of the surface below the sea-level. The southern portion is very shallow. The Dead Sea lies embedded between lofty cliffs of naked limestone, its shores presenting a scene of desolation and solitude, encompassed by desert sands and bleak, stony salt hills, except where there are fresh-water streams, in which localities the shores are fertile. Lofty mountains, exhibiting stupendous precipices, rise on the E. shore to a height of 2000 and 2500 feet above the water, and on the W. the rocky barriers attain an elevation of 1500 feet. Its waters are so thoroughly impregnated with salt that their specific gravity, as compared with pure water, is about one and one-sixth, and no fish or shellfish—or, indeed, animal forms of any kind but the lowest—are known to exist in it. A mountain of rock-salt on its SW. side is called Hajr Usdum, —i.e., "stone of Sod'om." Asphaltum was thrown to the surface at its southern extremity in large quantities after the earthquakes of 1834 and 1837.

Delaware, del'a-war, a river of the eastern United States, formed by two branches, sometimes called the Coquago and the Popacton, which rise in the Western Catskills of New York near the NE. border of Delaware co., and unite at Hancock, in the same county. From this point it runs southeastward, forming the boundary between New York and Pennsylvania, until it reaches Port Jervis and touches the northern extremity of New Jersey. Confronted here by the barrier of the Kittatinny Mountain, it deflects its course southwestward along the base of that ridge to the Delaware Water Gap, where, in a region of strikingly picturesque scenery, it has cut a gorge-like passage through the mountain and appears on the Atlantic side. This mountain-gap, which parallels the cut of the Potomac across the Blue Ridge at Harper's Ferry and that of the Hudson across the Highlands, is 2 miles long and is flanked by precipitous heights which rise 1000-1200 feet above the water. (See DELAWARE WATER GAP.) After passing Easton the river flows southeastward to Bordentown, and thence southwestward to Philadelphia, about 40 miles below which, between the states of Delaware and New Jersey, it expands into the estuary called Delaware Bay (which see). This river forms the entire boundary between New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The length of the main stream is estimated at 375 miles. It is about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a mile wide at Philadelphia, and  $\frac{2}{3}$  or 3 miles wide at some points below that city. The tide ascends to Trenton, about 130 miles from the sea. The chief towns on its banks are Philadelphia, Wilmington, Camden, Chester, Trenton, Easton, Newcastle, Burlington, and Bristol. It is navigable for the largest ships to Philadelphia, and steamboats can ascend to Trenton during high tide. The lowest point at which the river is crossed by a bridge is Philadelphia. A canal follows the right bank of this river from Bristol to Easton, about 60 miles, and other canals connect the Delaware with the Hudson River. The Delaware and Chesapeake Canal also unites Delaware City, on the lower river in Delaware, with Chesapeake City, Md., and thus places Philadelphia in direct water-communication with Baltimore. The chief tributaries of the Delaware are the Lehigh and Schuylkill rivers and Brandywine and Rancocas creeks.

Delaware, one of the Middle Atlantic states, in area the smallest state in the Union except Rhode Island, is bounded N. by Pennsylvania, E. by the Delaware River and Bay and the Atlantic Ocean, and S. and W. by Maryland. Its length (from 38° 28' to 39° 50' N. lat.) is 96 miles; its breadth ranges from 9 to 36 miles. Area, 2050 sq. m. (of the land-surface, 1960 sq. m.), more than one-half of which consists of cultivated farm-lands.

Face of the Country.—The N. portion is finely diversified with hill and dale and is one of the most fertile, beautiful, and healthful tracts in the state. Southward the surface is nearly a dead level, relieved by a long low ridge or water-shed running N. and S., and having numerous swampy tracts, whence flow to the E. and W. most of the streams of the state. The southern portion is mainly sandy, with large marsh- and swamp-tracts remaining. The highest elevation of the state appears to be only 280 feet above the sea. Along the coast there are salt-marshes and some shallow lagoons fenced from the open sea by long, low sand-spits. The interior of the state has much light soil, which is easily and profitably cultivated. Kaolin, bog-iron, glass-sand, and shell-marl are found, all of which have been wrought to a considerable extent. The greater part of the state is constituted of Cretaceous, Tertiary, and Post-Tertiary deposits, but in the N. the Archaean or Azoic basement unites it with the (presumably) Archaean tract of the Philadelphia region. Delaware stands fourth among the states of the Union as a producer of granite. From some of the swamps large quantities of well-preserved and excellent timber have been dug and wrought into shingles. There are useful chalybeate waters at Faulkland, in the N. The streams—Brandywine, Christians, Duok, Murderkill, Jones, Mischidion, Indian, and Nanticoke—are mainly insignificant, although affording many navigable highways to the interior. Christians Creek admits merchant-vessels of considerable tonnage. Delaware Bay and the Delaware River have a deep but not very direct channel, and the western shore of the bay at most points is not readily accessible for large vessels. Rehoboth Bay admits vessels of 6 feet draught. The Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, finished in 1829 at a cost of $2,250,000, extends 13½ miles from Delaware City to Chesapeake City, Md., and affords passage for coasting-vessels, canal-boats, barges, and small steamers. The noble breakwater at Lewes, begun in 1828 by the United States government, was constructed to afford a harbor of refuge, and for this purpose it has proved eminently serviceable.

Products.—Delaware, once celebrated for its excellent wheat, still produces bountiful crops of that grain and of the other cereals, especially of corn. The principal agricultural crops were in 1900: corn, 5,010,000 bushels; wheat, 1,480,000 bushels; oats, 332,700 bushels; and hay, 44,400 tons. Of late years the production of fruit, notably of peaches, with strawberries and the other small fruits, has been the leading industry. Market-gardening, particularly the raising of early spring vegetables for the supply of the Northern cities, for which the fertile soil and genial climate of the state give a special fitness, attracts much capital. The fruit-evaporating and canning-industries, with large plants at Dover, Milford, Middletown, Smyrna, etc., are prosecuted on an extensive scale. Oyster-, menhaden- and other fisheries and the working of phosphates are also important non-manufacturing industries of the state.

Manufactures are carried on chiefly in Wilmington and its vicinity. The manufactured products are various, and include leather and leathern goods, ships (iron and wood), machinery, cottons, woollens, cars and carriages, car-wheels, cigars, gunpowder, lumber, cast- and wrought-iron, hardware, flour, paper, tobacco, matches, and chemicals.

Counties, Towns, etc.—Delaware has 3 counties: New-castle in the N., Kent in the centre, and Sussex in the S. The principal towns are Wilmington, a thriving manufacturing city and railroad centre (pop. in 1900, 76,508), Dover, the capital (pop. 3329), Newcastle (pop. 3380), Smyrna, Lewes, Delaware City, Milford, Laurel, Seaford, and Georgetown. The chief educational institution is Delaware College, located at Newark. An agricultural college for colored students is at Dover.

Constitution, etc.—The first constitution was adopted in 1776; a second was adopted in 1792; and the present one in 1897. The governor is elected for four years. The senate consists of 17 members, 7 from the northern county and 5 from each of the other two; they are chosen for a term of four years. The house of representatives has 35 members, the northern county furnishing 15 and the remaining two 10 each. The legislature, called the General Assembly, meets biennially. Delaware has 1 representative in the national congress.

History.—Delaware Bay was discovered by Hudson in 1609, and visited in 1611 by Lord De la Warr. In 1631 the Dutch established a settlement near Cape Henlopen, which was destroyed by the Indians in 1633. In 1638 some Swedes and Finns founded the colony of New Sweden, which extended as far up the river as Wicaco, now in Philadelphia. The region was claimed by the Dutch, and war ensued, resulting in 1655 in the breaking up of the Swedish colony by Dutch forces from New Amsterdam. When New Netherland fell into the hands of the English, the possession of Delaware was disputed by the Duke of York and Lord Baltimore. The year 1683 witnessed the purchase of the proprietorship by William Penn. Thenceforth the region, which was known as the Three Lower Counties on the Delaware, was governed as a part of Pennsylvania until 1703, when it received a separate legislature. The three counties remained, however, under the proprietary governors of Pennsylvania until the Revolution. In 1776 Delaware declared itself an independent state. Delaware was the first state to ratify the United States constitution, 1787. It retained slavery until it was abrogated in 1865 by the thirteenth amendment to the Federal constitution.

The population in 1790 was 59,094; in 1800, 64,273; in 1810, 72,674; in 1820, 72,749; in 1830, 76,748; in 1840, 78,085; in 1850, 91,532; in 1860, 112,216; in 1870, 126,015; in 1880, 146,608; in 1890, 168,493; in 1900, 184,735.

Delaware, a county in the E. part of Indiana, has an area of 395 sq. m. It is intersected by the Mississinewa River and the West Fork of the White River. Capital, Muncie. Pop. in 1890, 30,131; in 1900, 49,624.

Delaware, a post-village of Middlesex co., Ontario, on the Thames River, 14 miles NW. of St. Thomas. Pop. 300.

Delaware Bay is an inlet of the sea, or an estuary, through which the Delaware River enters the Atlantic Ocean. It is between Delaware on the W. and New Jersey on the E. The entrance of the bay, which is between Cape May and Cape Henlopen, is about 11 miles wide and its length is nearly 60 miles. It is about 3 miles wide at the upper extremity (near Delaware City), below which it gradually expands to a width of 25 miles. A long break-water, constructed by the Federal government, in this bay, at Cape Henlopen, forms a safe and spacious harbor, in which the water is from 4 to 6 fathoms deep.

Delaware City, a banking city of Newcastle co., Del., on the Delaware River where it merges into Delaware Bay, about 12 miles S. by W. of Wilmington. It is the eastern terminus of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; it is on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore R. Pop. in 1900, 1132.

Delfshaven. See DELFTSHAVEN.

Delft, dèlft (commonly pronounced dëlft), a town of the Netherlands, in South Holland, 9 miles NW. of Rotterdam, on the canal between it and the Hague. It is intersected by a number of canals, bordered with lindens. The principal edifices are the palace in which William of Orange was assassinated, 1584, now used as a museum; a mediæval Gothic church, with the tomb of that prince and that of Grotius; another old church, with the tombs of Van Tromp, Peter Hein, and Leeuwenhoeck, and the town-hall. The town possesses a large polytechnic institute and supports an institution for the training of officials for the East India service. It has an extensive military arsenal and manufactures of arms and ammunition. Delft was formerly famous for the manufacture of the kind of pottery known as delft-ware, but such articles are now mostly made elsewhere. This industry has recently revived. The most attractive feature of Delft is the beautiful suburban workmen's quarter, called Agneta Park. Pop. in 1903, 32,084.

Delhi, or Dehli, dèl'lee (anc. Indraprastha, afterwards Dillī), a city of British India, capital of a district and division of the same name, in the SE. corner of the Punjab, and formerly capital of the Mogul empire. It is on the right bank of the Jumna. Lat. 28° 40' N.; lon. 77° 17' E. The river is here crossed by a splendid railway bridge. The town consists of a Mohammedan and a Hindu quarter. The English district, containing the arsenal and barracks, is separated from the rest of the city. Delhi is partly surrounded by a lofty stone wall, with a number of imposing gates. The principal street is lined with stately buildings and is an animated thoroughfare. Under the old Mogul emperors, Delhi became in the seventeenth century the most magnificent city in the world. The population of the city at the height of its splendor is said to have numbered 2,000,000. Many of the finest architectural monuments are now dilapidated or in ruins. The vast palace of Shah Jehan (called the Fort), the abode of the Mogul emperors, in part torn down by the authorities since the rebellion of 1857, was a surpassing product of Moslem architecture. It is a mile or more in circuit and presents in its interior a bewildering display of carvings and inlaid-work. The Jumna Masjid, or great mosque, also the work of Shah Jehan, built of red sandstone and white marble, is one of the glories of India. Another remarkable structure is the black mosque. In the suburbs are the splendid tombs of the imperial family. The Kutab-Minar is an exquisitely constructed tower rising to a height of 238 feet and tapering from a width of 47 ft. to 9 ft. at the top. The surrounding country to the extent of 40 sq. m. is covered with the debris of ruined buildings. The town is well supplied with water by an aqueduct and has public gardens of great extent and beauty. The bazaars of Delhi are famous for their shawls, their precious stones, and their gold- and silver-ware. The city is a great industrial-, banking- and commercial-centre. Delhi may be regarded as the capital of Mohammedanism in India. Its printing-presses are busy reproducing the masterpieces of Arabic, Persian, and Hindustani literature. The city first became the seat of an independent Mohammedan realm at the beginning of the thirteenth century. It was taken by Baber, the founder of the Mogul dynasty, in 1526 and has been under British rule since 1803. In 1857 it was the scene of a terrible massacre of Europeans, and in the same year it was stormed and taken by a small British and native force after a memorable siege. Pop. in 1872, 154,417; in 1891, 193,580; in 1901, 208,385.

Denmark (Dan. Danmark, dán'maark; Ger. Dänemark, dá'neh-maark'; La. Dania), a kingdom of Europe, comprising the peninsula of Jutland and a group of islands in the Baltic, and lying between 54° 34' and 57° 44' 52" N. lat. and 8° 4' and 12° 45' E. lon., with the exception of the island of Bornholm, which lies between 14° 42' and 15° 10' E. lon. It is bounded N. by the Skagerrak, E. by the Cattegat, the Sound, and the Baltic, S. by the Baltic and the Prussian district of Schleswig, and W. by the North Sea. The largest island is Seeland (Zealand), on which is Copenhagen, the capital; the next in size is Fünen or Fyen, separated from Jutland by only a narrow channel; after which come Laaland, Bornholm, Falster, Langeland, Møen, Samsø, Årø, Amager, Læsø, and Anholt, here enumerated in the order of their extent or importance. Denmark is divided into 18 administrative districts (amter), in addition to the city of Copenhagen. Area, 15,360 sq. m. Pop. in 1876, 1,903,000; in 1890, 2,185,159; in 1901, 2,464,770. The colonial possessions of the kingdom are Iceland, the Faroe Islands, Greenland (to about the 74th or 75th parallel of N. latitude), and the Danish West Indies—Santa Cruz (St. Croix), St. Thomas, and St. John.

Physical Features and Geology.—The coast is generally low and sandy, the western coast of Jutland being a succession of sand-ridges and shallow lagoons, dangerous to shipping. The eastern coast is not so inhospitable, and contains several excellent harbors, especially in the islands. The long fjords or firths, penetrating far into the land, constitute the most distinctive physical feature. The most remarkable of these is the Lyngfjord or Lümford, which crosses Jutland, so that its N. portion is insular. Inland the surface is low, the highest point, the Ejler-Bavnehøj, in eastern Jutland, being only 560 feet above sea-level. The greater part of the land, which is structurally a continuation of the plain of northern Germany, lies at an elevation of less than 100 feet. Though low, the surface is pleasantly diversified, rising a little at the coast and into flattened knolls in the interior. The landscape of the islands and the southeastern part of Jutland is rich in beech woods, corn-fields, and meadows; but in the western and northern districts of Jutland this gives place to a wide expanse of moorland covered with heather. Extensive areas of dune-sand line the W. coast, and in the interior there is considerable steppeland. There are neither rivers nor lakes of importance, the Guden (Guden-aa), the largest Danish stream, being little more than a creek, although it measures nearly 100 miles in length. Other streams are the Ribe-aa, Konge-aa, Skjern-aa, Skive-aa, etc. All the Danish rocks belong to the upper series of the Mesozoic and the Tertiary formations, and have been deposited in regular succession. The rock most fully developed is chalk; above the chalk lies an extensive (glacial) boulder formation, immediately above which are thick beds of clay and marl. Elsewhere a fairly massive brown-coal or lignite is interposed between the chalk and the glacial drift, which includes much morainic material.

Climate.—The climate presents no remarkable features, much resembling that of Scotland, except that its transitions are more rapid. Its main feature is humidity. The mean temperature of Copenhagen is 33° Fahr. in winter and 63.5° in summer. The mean for the year is 46.5°. The annual rainfall is about 21 inches. Snow falls on an average 30 days in the year, and storms of wind and rain are frequent.

Fauna and Flora.—The fauna presents no special peculiarities. All the larger wild quadrupeds, even the red deer, are now extinct. The fox, badger, hare, and some others of the smaller quadrupeds that belong to the north of Europe, are still found. The usual domestic animals are abundant, with the exception of the goat. The flora presents a greater variety, the ordinary north European plants growing luxuriantly in the mild and protected soil of the eastern coast and the islands. There is considerable heath-land. The Danish forests, which now cover hardly 5 per cent. of the land-surface, are almost entirely made up of beech. The oak was at one time the characteristic tree, but both it and the ash are now exceedingly rare. Except in Bornholm, no conifer grows in Denmark save under cultivation.

Agriculture.—Denmark is essentially an agricultural country. It is a great grain-producing region. Oats, barley, and rye take the lead among the cereals. Potatoes are largely grown, and beets are raised in prodigious quantities for the manufacture of sugar. The usual European fruit trees and bushes, as apples, pears, plums, cherries, gooseberries, raspberries, and currants, produce good crops, and even peaches and apricots ripen in sheltered spots. But cattle-breeding and dairy-husbandry are the great features of Danish agriculture and the leading industries of the country. Dairy produce and live-stock constitute the bulk of the exports, the principal share of which goes to Great Britain. The exports of pork, butter, eggs, and lard in 1899 were valued at 190,000,000 kroner (about $48,000,000). The total exports of home produce in 1902 amounted to 319,887,000 kroner. The land is minutely subdivided, owing partly to the state of the law, which prohibits the union of small farms and encourages the parceling out of landed property.

Minerals.—The mineral products are unimportant, Denmark being in this respect one of the poorest countries of Europe. Although a good quality of lignite is found in some parts, most of the peasants burn turf and peat for house-fuel.

Manufactures and Commerce.—Manufacturing is not carried on to any large extent. A notable industry is the manufacture of porcelain. The Copenhagen potters are famous for very graceful designs, and their products in porcelain have a distinctive character. There are considerable iron-foundries, especially around Copenhagen. In the same city there are manufactures of locomotives and machinery. The woollen-, linen- and cotton-manufactures, as well as those of gloves, hosiery, wooden shoes, etc., are mostly domestic and carried on for local consumption. Sugar-refineries prepare most of the sugar from beets for the home market. In 1902 the production of beet-sugar amounted to 388,234 tons; of margarine and oleomargarine, 19,730 tons. The distilling- and brewing-industries are considerable. Amber is gathered in large quantities. The commercial marine of Denmark consists of about 4000 vessels, aggregating over 400,000 tons. The most important seaports are Copenhagen, Aalborg, Aarhus, and Elsinore. The Danish fisheries are still of considerable importance. Turbot, torak, herring, and salmon are largely caught, and oyster-beds occur on the E. coast and elsewhere. The seal-fisheries are considerable, the principal station being the island of Anholt. The total value of the Danish fisheries in 1901 was 8,683,478 kroner (about $2,160,000).

Government, Army and Navy.—Denmark is a hereditary constitutional monarchy. The diet (Rigsdag) consists of two houses, called respectively the Folkething (lower house) and the Landething (upper house or senate). The members of the Folkething are elected for a term of three years by the direct votes of all citizens who have reached the age of thirty years. The Landething consists of 66 members, most of whom are chosen by indirect election for a term of eight years, there being 12 life-members, appointed by the crown. The state council or cabinet (Statsrådet) is composed of 8 ministers: the president (who is also minister of foreign affairs) and the ministers of the interior, justice, finance, war, marine, public instruction and ecclesiastical affairs, and agriculture. The hereditary nobility of Denmark has been abolished.

There were, in 1903, 1879 miles of railway in operation.

Church, Education, etc.—The established religion is Lutheran, but unlimited toleration is conceded to all, no man being bound to contribute to support a form of worship of which he is not a member. The church is under 7 bishops, who are nominated by the crown. The Bishop of Seeland or Roeskilde is the metropolitan, and the sees of the other bishops correspond to the other 6 stifts or ecclesiastical provinces. There are few dissenters. At the head of the educational institutions is the famous university of Copenhagen, founded in 1479. There are a veterinary and agricultural college at Copenhagen, about 20 agricultural or horticultural schools, a college of pharmacy, a royal academy of arts, nearly 100 technical and commercial schools, etc. The inhabitants of Denmark are nearly all Danes. No country in the world has a more homogeneous population. The Danish language is a member of the Scandinavian group of languages (forming part of the Teutonic stock), to which the old Norse, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swedish belong. Danish is the literary language of Norway. The land is rich in antiquities, its kjökken-møddings (kitchen-middens or refuse-heaps), in which relics of the aboriginal inhabitants are found, constituting a distinctive feature.

History.—The earliest inhabitants of Denmark of whom history leaves any record were the Cimbric, the same people who menaced the Roman dominions at the close of the second century B.C. From them the main-land received its name of the Cimbric Chersonese. We next hear of a Gothic race occupying the land, under their mythical chief Odin, whose successors made themselves the terror of western Europe, under the name of Northmen or Vikings. Three successive Danish kings (Canute, Harold, Hardicanute) ruled England from 1017 to 1042. After their conversion to Christianity, this people so extended their sway that the Baltic was regarded as a Danish inland sea. In 1397, Margaret of Denmark, by the treaty of Kalmar, united the three Scandinavian kingdoms, and after the dissolution of the union the Danes retained Norway till 1814, when it was ceded to Sweden. In 1848 the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein revolted against Danish rule, and appealed to the German powers for support. Prussia and some of the other states took up arms in their behalf, but the intervention was a half-hearted one and the duchies were allowed to return under Danish sway in the terms of the London Protocol of 1852. In the second Schleswig-Holstein War, 1864, the armies of Prussia and Austria effected the liberation of the duchies, which, together with Lauenburg, were incorporated with Prussia in 1866.

Lat. of city-hall, 42° 19' 51" N.; lon. 83° 2' 54.6" W. Detroit is an important railway junction, the Grand Trunk, the Michigan Central, the Wabash, and numerous other roads centering here or passing through the city. It has a river-front of many miles. The river, "the Dardanelles of the New World," is here half a mile to 3 miles wide, has no freshets, and makes an admirable harbor. The city, which occupies a rather flat site about 580 feet above the sea, is laid out on the rectangular plan, with a number of imposing centrally radiating avenues and boulevards. The chief of these, representing the commercial activity and life of the city, is Woodward Avenue, which divides the city into two nearly equal parts. Its expansion, about  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile from the river, is known as the Campus Martius. Among the public and other structures are the city-hall, government and county buildings, public library (containing upward of 180,000 volumes), Harper Hospital, and a museum of art. The educational institutions comprise Detroit College, Detroit Colleges of Law and Medicine, the Michigan College of Medicine and Surgery, and the Academy of the Sacred Heart. Grand Circus Park is a tastefully laid out square with trees and fountains. A soldiers' monument, designed by Randolph Rogers, adorns the site in front of the city-hall. The city is now surrounded by a wide boulevard, which begins and terminates at the river-front. Belle Isle, reached by a bridge across an arm of the river, is a beautiful public park, covering about 700 acres. The commerce of Detroit is enormous, its main traffic being in grain, wool, pork, lard, hides, and copper. The staple manufactures are those of iron and steel goods, boilers and engines, cars and car-wheels, electrical appliances, drugs, paints, varnish, stoves, and tobacco. It has important lumbering interests and large tanneries. The annual value of the manufactured product is about \$100,000,000, the foundry and machine-shop products in 1900 being placed at \$8,940,000, and drugs at \$4,900,000. The site of Detroit was part of New France. It was settled as a trading and fortified post by Cadillac in 1701, became British in 1760, American in 1796, British again in 1812, and finally American in 1813. It was incorporated as a city in 1824. It was the capital of Michigan Territory and for a time of the state. District, a township of Berks co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 651.

District of Columbia, a district of the United States, containing the federal capital. It has the Potomac River as its SW. boundary and is enclosed on all other sides by Maryland. The district originally comprised a tract 10 miles square, lying on both sides of the Potomac, but in 1846 that portion lying SW. of the river was retroceded to Virginia by the United States. Present area, 69 sq. m. (land 60 sq. m.; water 9 sq. m.). It was formerly divided into the cities of Georgetown and Washington and the co. of Washington, but there are no longer any distinctions having civil significance. Georgetown, which existed as a municipality before the foundation of Washington, was deprived of its charter in 1871 and became part of Washington in 1878. Mount Pleasant, Tenallytown, Brightwood, Uniontown, Benning, etc., are small places outside of the strict limits of Washington.

The face of the country is undulating, with fine hills and pleasant fertile valleys, and a light, fertile soil. The Potomac is a noble tidal stream, navigable for vessels of large burden up to Washington. The Anacostia River, known also as the East Branch of the Potomac, is the eastern boundary of Washington, and the picturesque Rock Creek separates the city within its original limits from Georgetown. The geological formation is Cretaceous, covered with an extensive conglomerate or breccia, the age of which still remains somewhat uncertain.

Industries.—The agricultural and market-gardening facilities of the district are very good, and the market for farm- and garden-products excellent. The principal manufactures are those of flour and other mill-products, brick, and lumber, carried on mainly at Georgetown, which has a considerable coasting-trade. In the fiscal year ending June, 1900, there were no exports. The imports entered in the Georgetown customs district aggregated in value $206,730. The Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio Rrs. connect Washington with Baltimore and the North and West; and a railroad bridge across the Potomac connects the city with the southern railroad systems.

Public Works, Benevolent Institutions, etc.—These include the permanent institutions of the general government as well as those of the district as such, besides the Washington Asylum, the United States Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Asylum, Freedmen's Hospital, National Soldiers' Home, National Deaf-Mute College, and many institutions, public and private, devoted to charities and the relief of the afflicted. The principal government and other institutions are noticed in the article WASHINGTON.

Education.—Separate free public schools are maintained for white and colored children. There are normal, high, grammar, intermediate, and primary schools. In 1899 the enrollment of pupils in the public schools was 45,560, with an average attendance of 34,032. The district is the seat of the Catholic University of America, Georgetown University (Roman Catholic), Columbian University (Baptist), Howard University (for colored), Gonzaga College (Roman Catholic), the National Deaf-Mute College, and the Carnegie Institute, founded in 1902. Among professional schools are several theological, law, and medical schools, mostly departments of some one of the universities, and a school of pharmacy. The Smithsonian Institution, National Museum, the United States Signal Office, Naval Observatory, Corcoran Art Gallery, Army Medical Museum, the botanical garden, zoological garden, and the Congressional and other public libraries add largely to the educational advantages of the district. Washington is the seat of numerous scientific associations and of the special national surveys of the states and territories. See WASHINGTON, D.C.

History.—From the time of the close of the Revolutionary war until 1790, there were earnest discussions as to the place where the seat of the United States government should be fixed. Philadelphia, Carlisle, Philadelphia again, then Princeton, Annapolis, Trenton, and New York, were in turn the temporary places of the meetings of Congress. In 1788 Maryland ceded to the United States the present territory for the purpose of establishing here the seat of federal authority; and in 1789 Virginia augmented the gift by the cession of a tract of 36 sq. m. on the SW. side of the river. The gift was accepted by Congress in 1790, and the year 1800 was settled upon as the date of the establishment of the national capital on the banks of the Potomac River. More than 100 years before, the site of the future capital had been named Rome by the proprietor of a plantation situated there, one Francis Pope, and the hill where the United States capitol stands was by him called the Capitoline Hill. Congress met at Philadelphia from 1790 to 1800. The new town was incorporated in 1802 and named Washington. The county and city of Alexandria, on the Virginia side, were retroceded to Virginia in 1846. Congress abolished slavery in the District of Columbia in 1862. Before 1871 the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the co. of Washington had a corporate existence, but Congress had exclusive legislative control, and the people of the district had no delegate or other representative in Congress. The more important judicial positions were filled by the federal authority. In 1871 a territorial government was instituted by Congress, and the district was permitted to send a delegate to the national house of representatives. In 1874 Congress abolished the territorial system and placed the government in the hands of 3 commissioners appointed by the president of the United States. The citizens have no vote in district or national affairs.

Population.—In 1800 the total population of the district was 8144; in 1810, 15,471; in 1820, 23,336; in 1830, 30,261; in 1840, 33,745; in 1850 (after the retrocession of Alexandria city and co., 51,687; in 1860, 75,800; in 1870, 131,700; in 1880, 177,624; in 1890, 230,392; and in 1900, 278,718, of whom 86,700 were colored.

Dresden, drês'dên (Ger. pron. drâs'dên; L. Dres'da), a city of Germany, capital of the kingdom of Saxony, on both banks of the Elbe, 103 miles S. by E. of Berlin and 230 miles ENE. of Frankfurt-on-the-Main. Lat. (observatory) 51° 2' 16" N., lon. 13° 43' 43" E. It is situated in a picturesque and fertile valley, and consists of the Altstadt (Old Town), with its numerous suburbs, among them the Pirnaische Vorstadt, Johannstadt, Seevorstadt, and Wilsdruffer Vorstadt, and the quarter of Friedrichstadt, all on the left bank of the river; and the Neustadt (New Town), formerly known as Alt Dresden, with its various suburbs, Antonstadt, Leipziger Vorstadt, etc., on the right bank. The river is crossed by many bridges, the oldest, the Augustusbrücke, with sixteen arches, dating from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

The old town consists of narrow streets and lofty houses. The newer portions of the city are more openly built; the houses are not so lofty, but are generally of a pleasing exterior, frequently surrounded by gardens. In the Altstadt are located the principal public buildings and palaces, with their art treasures. The most prominent is the royal palace, a vast, complex, irregular building, embracing lofty towers, galleries, arched gateways, and the Grüne Gewölbe (Green Vault), the repository of the immense royal collection of gems, costly art objects, and bric-à-brac, perhaps the richest collection of its kind in all Europe. This building dates from the sixteenth century, and was subsequently enlarged and embellished, especially in the time of Augustus the Strong. The other notable edifices in the Altstadt are the Royal Catholic Church, adjoining the royal palace; the splendid museum, one of the noblest examples of modern Renaissance architecture, with its famous gallery of paintings, one of the finest north of the Alps; the ornate collection of pavilions and one-storied galleries called the Zwinger, containing works of art, principally casts, and scientific and natural science collections; the handsome new court theatre, the Prinzsenpalais, the Protestant Court Church (dating from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries), and the museum Johanneum, with its historical and valuable porcelain and pottery collections. The Japanese Palace, or Augusteum, in which the royal library of 400,000 volumes and the antiquarian collections are kept, is in the Neustadt. Other buildings of interest are the Brühl palace, erected by the powerful minister of Augustus II., the academy of fine arts, the art exposition hall (the two latter buildings flanking the spacious Brühl Terrace), the fine royal guard-house, several town-halls, besides interesting churches and many handsome residences. Dresden is studded with sculptural monuments, including equestrian and allegorical statues, busts, and beautiful fountains, in bronze and in stone. Many of these works are the creations of the famous sculptors, Riettschel, Schilling, Hähnel, and Henze, who made this city their home. Among the most prominent of these monuments are the one to King Frederick Augustus I., the equestrian statues of Augustus the Strong and King John, the Germania monument, and the Wettin obelisk to commemorate the 800th anniversary of the present dynasty of the House of Wettin.

Hardly another town in the world has so many large and valuable collections of paintings, statuary, gems, arms, porcelain, jewels, and other objects of vertu; and it is these collections which give Dresden its chief attraction, and which have won for it the appellation of the "German Florence." The city is well supplied with beautiful and elegantly laid-out walks. After the Napoleonic wars the fortifications were levelled and their site converted into gardens, promenades, and squares. The Brühl Terrace, in front of the Brühl palace, overlooking the Elbe, the Great Garden in the Pirna suburb, 5 miles in circumference, adjoining which is the nursery of fruit-trees, the gardens of the Japanese Palace, the zoological and botanical gardens, and Prince George's garden are among the favorite places of public resort. Dresden is the seat of numerous excellent educational institutions, and it is a great musical as well as art centre. Among special schools are the royal technological and veterinary institutes and the academy of fine arts. The city is the residence of a large foreign population, many of them attracted hither by the advantages offered in the way of musical and art study. Dresden is noted for its fine bathing-establishments. It is generously equipped with charitable and benevolent institutions. The manufacturing industries of Dresden are many and varied, including the manufacture of machinery, pianos, bicycles, boats, metal-ware, including gold- and silver-ware, china and glass, chemical apparatus, confectionery, beer, and cigars. There are numerous printing, lithographic, and photographic establishments. Dresden partakes of the climate of the Elbe valley, which is subject to sudden changes. Mean annual temperature, 49° Fahr.; winter, 33°; summer, 66°.

Dresden appears originally to have been a village of Wendish fishermen on the right bank of the Elbe, where the present Neustadt is situated. In the eleventh century the town was built on the left bank, where the Altstadt now stands. In the eighteenth century, under Augustus (Frederick Augustus) the Strong and his successor, Augustus (Frederick Augustus) II., Dresden attained great splendor. Here on Aug. 26-27, 1813, was fought a great battle between Napoleon and the allies, under Prince Schwarzenberg, in which the French were victorious. Pop. in 1834, 73,614; in 1855, 117,750; in 1880, 220,218; in 1901, 399,742; in 1903 (the area having been largely extended), 494,000.

Dublin (Irish, Bally-ah-eliath, "the town on the ford of the hurdles," or Dubb-linn, "black pool," the Eblana of Ptolemy?), the capital city of Ireland and of the co. of Dublin, and a civic county in itself, situated on the Liffey, close to its entrance into Dublin Bay, Irish Sea, 66 miles W. of Holyhead and 135 miles W. of Liverpool. Lat. (observatory of Trinity College, at Dunsink)  $53^{\circ} 23' 13''$  N.; lon.  $6^{\circ} 20' 17''$  W. It is built in part on land reclaimed from the Liffey, and is divided into nearly equal portions by the river, which flows through it from west to east. The southeastern part of the city is the residence district, while the principal shops are in the centre. It is regularly laid out with broad, well-paved streets and numerous squares. Its principal street, Sackville Street, 700 yards long and 40 yards broad, presents an imposing appearance, with the Rotunda and Rutland Square at its north end, the Ionic portico of the general post-office and Nelson's Monument (134 feet high) in the centre, and O'Connell's Bridge and a number of residences at the south. Of the squares, St. Stephen's, laid out as a People's Park, is the largest, and Merrion Square the most beautiful. At the western end of the city is Phoenix Park, one of the largest and most magnificent parks of the world, covering about 1750 acres, and containing the vice-regal residence, an exercise ground, military hospital, zoological garden, and the Wellington obelisk.

Dublin is flanked N. and S. by the Royal and Grand canals, and is surrounded by a highway called the "Circular Road," 9 miles in length. Within the limits of this Circular Road the Liffey is crossed by 12 bridges, and along the banks of the river run granite walls and parapets. Along these "quays" extend houses and shops. The harbor has been much improved by the completion of two large breakwaters, known as the North and South "walls," and it has fine docks. See DUBLIN BAY.

Dublin has very attractive environs, and its suburbs contain many beautiful villas. The city possesses many buildings of note, among the most important of which are Leinster House, formerly the home of the duke of Leinster and now the seat of the Royal Dublin Society, the National Art Gallery, Museum of Natural History, the new buildings of the Science and Arts Museum, the National Library opened in 1890, the Bank of Ireland (formerly the parliament houses), the custom-house, the Four Courts, and the two Protestant cathedrals.—St. Patrick's and Christ Church. The University of Dublin, with its single college, Trinity, modelled on Trinity College, Cambridge, was founded in 1591 and has over 1000 students. Its library contains 250,000 volumes. Dublin contains also a Roman Catholic University, and the Royal University of Ireland, an examining body. The city is the seat of a Roman Catholic and an Anglican archbishop. The chief manufactures are porter (for which Dublin is noted), whiskey, and poplin. The city sends 4 members to parliament, besides 2 from the university. The climate of Dublin is very temperate. The average temperature in January is about  $40^{\circ}$ , in July about  $60^{\circ}$ . Average annual rainfall, about 29 inches.

The early history of Dublin is largely legendary; the city was taken by the Danes in the ninth century, and remained in their hands until the English conquest. Dublin is the birthplace of Swift, Steele, Sheridan, Thomas Moore, and the duke of Wellington. Pop. in 1664, 8159; in 1777, 137,000; in 1804, 152,000; in 1871, 246,326; in 1891, 254,001; in 1901, 239,108. Dundee, dūn-dee', a royal burgh of Scotland, co. of Forfar, finely situated on the left bank of the Firth of Tay, 10 miles from the sea and 37 miles N. by E. of Edinburgh. Lat. 56° 28' N.; lon. 2° 58' W. It stretches along the Tay and recedes inland with a gradual ascent. Its appearance from the sea is striking and pleasing. The more recently formed streets are, in general, spacious and handsome; but most of those of more ancient date are irregular and ill built. The most conspicuous object in Dundee is its old tower, 156 feet high, erected by David, Earl of Huntingdon, in the twelfth century, and recently restored, with the so-called Town's Churches connected with it. Other interesting edifices are the town-hall (eighteenth century), and the modern buildings of the Royal Exchange and the Albert Institute. The principal institution of learning is University College, founded in 1880 through the munificence of Miss Baxter. The public library contains about 80,000 volumes.

Dundee has long been celebrated for its manufactures, and is the principal seat of the linen, hemp, and jute manufactures in Great Britain. Ship-building and the manufacture of machinery, marmalade (for which Dundee is noted), gloves, hosiery, etc., are also carried on. Dundee is now the principal seat of the British whale- and seal-fisheries. It has a commodious harbor, with ample docks, lately extended at a large cost. There are about 150 vessels belonging to the port, more than half of which are steamers. The Tay is crossed here by a railway bridge, 2 miles long and 77 feet above high-water, built to replace the famous Tay bridge, part of which with an entire passenger train was swept down into the river by a gale in 1879. About 4 miles below Dundee is Broughty Ferry, containing the villas of many wealthy merchants. The city sends 2 members to the House of Commons.

Dundee was at an early period a place of considerable note, and, like most old towns, was originally walled. It was created a royal burgh by William the Lion; and it has a conspicuous place in the mediæval history of Scotland. Its population was, in 1841, 64,629; in 1871, 121,925; in 1901, 160,871.

Lat. of observatory, 51° 12' 25' N.; lon. 6° 46' E. The city, which is generally well built, is divided into four sections,—the Altstadt, Neustadt, Karlstadt, and Friedrichstadt. Its old fortifications, razed after the Peace of Lunéville (1801), have been replaced by beautiful streets, promenades, and public squares. One of the most noteworthy thoroughfares is the Hofgarten, which stretches from the Rhine across the city to the Pempelforter Strasse. Among others, the Goldstein, Kaiser Wilhelm, Graf Adolf, Schadow, and Bismarck streets deserve mention. Düsseldorf has fine public squares, among which the Corneliusplatz, containing a statue of the painter Cornelius by Donnerdoff and a fountain by Misch, the Schadowplatz, with a colossal bronze bust of the painter Schadow, the Marktplatz, and the Maxplatz are noteworthy. Among the places of recreation are the botanical garden, a valuable zoological garden, and the People's Garden.

Of the numerous Catholic and Evangelical churches, the most important are the Church of St. Lambert (fourteenth century), built in the Gothic style with a Roman tower, the Church of St. Andrew, completed in 1629, and the Church of St. John, of red and gray sandstone, in Italian round style and with a lofty tower. The old church-yard on the Fischerstrasse contains the tombs of the painters Bendemann and Camphausen. The town-hall is an interesting edifice of the sixteenth century, in Gothic Renaissance style, recently enlarged in French Renaissance style, and adorned with fine mural paintings. The buildings of the Royal Academy of Art, designed in Renaissance style with a main façade 618 feet long, were built in 1879. The Academy of Art and the Museum contain valuable collections, but the famous Düsseldorf Gallery of pictures was removed to Munich in 1805. The city observatory is a gift of Professor Bensenzger. The industrial establishments of Düsseldorf are numerous and extensive, the principal manufactures being those of iron. The trade is very active.

Towards the close of the fourteenth century Düsseldorf became the residence of the Dukes of Berg. In the seventeenth century it passed into the possession of the Counts Palatine of Neuburg and subsequently formed part of the dominions of the Elector Palatine. During the revolutionary era Düsseldorf suffered greatly: from 1795-1801 it was French; in 1806 it became the capital of the Grand Duchy of Berg, and in 1814 it passed to Prussia. Since then the city has been steadily increasing in prosperity. Pop. in 1780, 8764; in 1871, 70,094; in 1900, 213,767.

The country is chiefly comprised between the Tian-Shan on the S. and the Greater Altai on the N. and in the E. it merges into the Mongolian Gobi tract. The surface consists chiefly of a moderately elevated and almost desert plateau, surrounded and partly intersected by lofty mountain-chains. Numerous rivers descend from the mountains, but many of them disappear in the sands of the desert or empty themselves into the lakes. The central Dzungarian basin sinks to a level of only 800 feet elevation. In the W. it is watered by the Ili and in the N. by the Black Irtysh, whose valley affords an easy passage into Semipalatinsk. Large tracts are nearly or altogether unfit for human habitation, but some of the plains and many of the valleys are covered with good pastures, and millet and barley are extensively cultivated. Large forests occur in the N. The domestic animals are principally the camel and buffalo. Among the minerals are gold, copper, and iron. Salt is obtained in abundance, both from salt-lakes and from mines. The inhabitants of Dzungaria, numbering a few hundred thousand, comprise Dsungars, Torgots, Khalkas, and Dungans. The Dsungars and Torgots are Kalmuck tribes. The emperor of China, after a long and bloody war, conquered Dzungaria shortly after the middle of the eighteenth century, and since that period it has been treated as a Chinese province.

Ecuador, ek'wá-dŭr', Sp. pron. á'kwá-dŭr' (i.e., "Equator"), a republic of South America, lying under the equator. It has the republic of Colombia on the N., Peru on the S., the Pacific Ocean on the W., and Peru and Brazil on the E. The eastern section of the boundary-lines remains in dispute, and with it a section of the country that adjoins Brazil, Colombia, and Peru. Until the boundaries are definitely settled the area of the latter can only be approximated. The Galápagos Islands belong to Ecuador. The official area, exclusive of the Galápagos Islands, is 115,650 sq. m., comprised in the 16 provinces of Azuay, Bolívar, Cañar, Cacha, Chimborazo, Esmeraldas, Guayas, Imbabura, León, Loja, Manabí, Oriente, Oro, Pichincha, Los Rios, and Tungurahua. Pop., inclusive of wild Indians, estimated at 1,400,000.

Physical Features.—This republic, like the others situated along the Andes, embraces every variety of climate, having tierras calientes, or low and hot tracts; tierras templadas, or temperate regions, from 6000 to 9000 feet above the sea; tierras frías, or cold districts, extending from the upper limits of the preceding to the borders of the páramos, or cold deserts, lying between the elevation of 11,000 feet and the limits of perpetual snow; and, finally, the nevados or snowy heights themselves. The culminating summits in this part of the Andes are ranged close together in double file, or along the outer edges of a narrow elevated longitudinal plateau or ridge-highland, in the hollows of which is collected the chief population of the state. On the W. of this elevated tract, towards the sea, the declivities of the Cordilleras are covered with dense forests. On the E., also, impenetrable forests occupy the mid-region between the temperate heights and the vast plains below. The double range of snow-clad mountains, several of them active volcanoes, encloses a series of valleys, varying in elevation from 8800 to 14,000 feet, which together constitute what was at one time known as the longitudinal Andean valley of the republic. Among these mountains, which figure as one of the most remarkable volcanic groups on the earth, are the following, whose range in height is from 15,000 to 20,500 feet:

W. RANGE.
Cotacachi.
Pichincha.
Corazón.
Iliniza.
Caraguairazo.
Chimborazo, 20,500 ft.

E. RANGE.
Cayambá, 19,200 ft.
Sara-Urcu.
Antimá, 19,300 ft. (approx.).
Cotopaxi, 19,000 ft.
Altar, 17,700 ft.
Tunguragua.
Sangay.
Sincholagua.

Towards the N. limit of Ecuador, the E. and W. mountain-masses converge to form the elevated tracts known as the Páramos de los Pastos, or the "knot" of Pasto, in southern Colombia. There is a similar convergence towards the S. in the knot of Loja, and between these focal points lie the series of elevated plateau-valleys—with that of Quito on the N.—to which reference has been made. About 40 miles S. of the equator the valley of Quito is closed by the Alto de Chisínche. S. of Chisínche the ridge again opens, and the valley of Ambato extends upward of 100 miles in length, between Chimborazo and Caraguairazo on the one side and the group of Sangay on the other. It terminates on the S. at the trachytic ridge of Asuay, where the páramo attains the height of 15,000 feet. Beyond this, towards the S., the valley of Cuenca succeeds, and stretches about 30 miles to the mountains of Loja. None of the summits on the sides of this valley attain the height of perpetual snow; indeed, the highest of them probably does not exceed 11,000 feet; and beyond the valley of Cuenca, towards the Marañon, the mountains sink to an elevation of 2000 or 3000 feet. Among the mountains enumerated above, Chimborazo holds the first place. Cotopaxi, though not the highest, is the most conspicuous peak in this most remarkable region of the Andes, and seemingly the loftiest active volcano of the globe.

The cultivated land of Ecuador lies chiefly in the valleys of Quito, Ambato, and Cuenca. The average height of this tract is about 9000 feet above the sea, though at its S. extremity, at and beyond Loja, it sinks about 2000 feet. The slopes of the Andes on both sides are still covered with forest, on which the encroachments of man are scarcely perceptible. For the broad physical features of the mountains see ANDES.

The mineral wealth of Ecuador is fairly extensive, quartz-gold being obtained at Zaruma, in the province of Oro, Loja, and elsewhere; placer-gold at Esmeraldas and in a number of stream-gravels; silver at Pillshum, in Cañar, etc.; and there are extensive deposits of copper and iron. Mercury (in Cuenca) and platinum are also found, and there is considerable petroleum. The product of emeralds was at one time of much value.

The rivers are for the most part rapid torrents, quite unavailable for purposes of internal communication, and commerce derives comparatively little aid from their navigation. The rivers of the eastern water-shed, tributaries of the Amazon, have long courses, but are not generally navigable till they reach the plains beyond the limits of the settled parts of the country. The Amazon, however (here called Marañon), is navigable to Borja for large vessels, and for lighter craft to Chuchunga. Flowing into it are the Santiago, Morona, Pastaza, Tigra, Napo, Ica or Putumayo, and Caqueta or Japurá,—the last three rivers from 600 to 1000 miles in length, and all having a SE. course. Some of these waters belong in greater part to territory claimed by Peru. On the W. side of the mountains the chief rivers are the Mira, the Esmeralda, and the Guayas, formed by the junction of the Caracool and the Daule. The last-named river affords an important commercial channel. The estuary at its mouth, being protected towards the sea by the large island of Puna, forms a secure and capacious harbor, called the Gulf of Puna. Guayaquil, one of the principal gulfs on the Pacific coast, lies partly within the republic of Ecuador.

Climate.—On the plain of Quito, 9500 feet above the sea, there reigns a perpetual spring, with a temperature so constant that even the snow-line on the surrounding mountains seems hardly to vary throughout the year. The absolute height of the snow-line is here about 15,700 feet. Rain is abundant at Quito, falling generally for a few hours in the afternoon. Farther S., in Loja, and E., in the plains, there is less rain than at Quito, while in the opposite direction, towards Barbacoas, it rains nearly every day. The country round Guayaquil is inundated to a great extent in the rainy season (July).

Fauna.—The fauna of Ecuador comprises most of the more distinctive types of South American life, including those inhabiting the hot lowland plains as well as those of the highlands and snowy tracts. Among a few of the forms may be mentioned the jaguar, puma, tapir, bear, cloth, eavy, deer, and armadillo; and among birds, the condor, numerous hummers, parrots, toucans, etc. Reptiles are abundant, and insect life is very prolific. The llama, alpaca, and guanaco are domesticated animals of transport.

Flora.—The botanical productions of this country are many and valuable, and include the cinchona or quinine-bark tree, which is still found in large forest-tracts. Extensive forests occupy the eastern lowlands, and also much of the western slopes of the mountains. In these we find a vast assemblage of the more characteristic vegetal forms of the tropical wilderness, while over much of the volcanic tracts, with porous soil, the vegetation consists largely of mimosa, agaves, cacti, and euphorbias. There are large areas of savannas (pajonales), of marsh tracts (tembladeras), and of the upland open pastures or páramos. Among the native products are numerous palms (among them the wax-palm), india-rubber, copal, dragon's blood, and many valuable kinds of timber. The potato appears to be indigenous to the land. Cacao, coffee, rice, pepper, and sugar-cane are cultivated in the low country; the plain of Quito produces cotton, maize, excellent wheat, and barley, the wheat being a characteristic product of the country. Coffee, cacao, sugar, vegetable ivory, leather, Panama hats, skins, india-rubber, cinchona, bamboos, sarsaparilla, archil, matiao, etc., are leading articles of export. Cacao, grown in Los Rios and other coast-provinces, is the staple product. The production in 1902 was 21,500,000 kilos. The export of ivory-nuts was for the same year over 18,000,000 kilos. In the equable climate of Quito wheat can ripen at any time of the year, and the season of sowing it depends in the several localities on slight differences of elevation. An indigenous species of tobacco, rendered fragrant by the process of drying, is cultivated in the neighborhood of Loja. Agriculture is still in a low condition, being largely in the hands of the aboriginal race.

Industries and Commerce.—The manufacturing industries of Ecuador are chiefly of a domestic nature. The Indians are comparatively industrious, making cotton-cloth, quilts, carpets, and pottery. They are also miners, agriculturists, herdsmen, and even manufacturers. Panama hats are extensively made. On the coast they formerly carried on a profitable pearl-fishery; but this has largely been abandoned. The commerce of Ecuador is chiefly carried on through the ports of Colombia and Peru and through Guayaquil. Communication in the lowland interior is mainly effected by the water-ways, on a few of which there is a limited steamboat navigation, and which are navigated by an extensive fleet of canoes and minor craft. The single highway is that which leads off from Quito towards Guayaquil, having a length of about 125 miles. The longest line of railway is that connecting Durán (opposite Guayaquil) with Guamote, 125 miles; this is, in fact, almost the entire amount of railroad now in operation. The length of telegraph service is measured on 1240 miles.

Government.—The executive is vested in a president, who is elected by direct vote for a term of 4 years. The vice-president's term of office extends from the middle of one presidential term to the middle of the next. The legislative power is vested in a senate and a chamber of deputies (house of representatives). The senators, two from each province, are elected by a direct vote for a term of four years. The members of the lower house are elected for a term of 2 years. The provinces are administered by governors. The Galapagos Islands are under a local administration. Men of all races and complexions are in theory politically equal, but the Indians are practically excluded from any share in the government. The Roman Catholic religion is professed by the inhabitants.

Chief Towns.—The chief towns are Quito, the capital; Guayaquil, the chief port and next to Quito in population; Cuenca, Riobamba, Latacunga, Ibarra, Ambato, Loja, Puer-toviejo, Emmeraldas, and Zaruma.

Population, etc.—Of the population of Ecuador the Indians, in great part speaking the Quichua or some cognate language, form more than half; the rest are negroes, mulattoes, mestizos, sambos, and whites, the last a small minority. The negroes are comparatively few, and chiefly on the coast.

The realm of the Incas extended over the mountain-region of Ecuador. The remains of royal roads or causeways and of tambos or palaces at Cayambé and on Asuay (more than 13,000 feet above the sea) attest the grandeur of design and careful execution of the works constructed by the natives. The country was conquered by Pizarro and part of it constituted the presidency of Quito under the viceroys of Peru. The defeat of the Spaniards at Pichincha in 1822 secured the liberation of the province from the Spanish yoke. It became part of the republic of Colombia, which was dissolved in 1829-30, three republics being constituted, —New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador.

Edinburgh, éd'-in-bür-rüh, Edinburghshire, éd'-in-bür-rüh-shir, or Midlothian, mid-lo'thian, a county situated in the eastern part of the lowlands of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the Firth of Forth. Area, 367 sq. m. The SE. part of the county is intersected by the Moorfoot Hills, a branch of the Lammermoors, which attain an elevation of about 2100 feet. From the SW. the Pentland range runs towards the NE., while the dioritic hills of Corstorphine extend from the Firth of Forth southward, and are represented by the elevations of the Castle Rock, Arthur's Seat, and Calton. Scald Saw, the most elevated of the Pentland range, is about 1900 feet above the sea. The principal rivers are the Water of Leith, the Esk, and the Almond. The greater part of the county belongs to the coal formation, and coal is extensively wrought. The region is chiefly agricultural, and farming is conducted on the best modern principles. Capital, Edinburgh. The county, as such, sends 1 member to the House of Commons. Pop. in 1901, 488,796.

Edinburgh (L. Edinbur'gum; Celtic, Duned'in), the capital of Scotland and of Edinburghshire or Midlothian, 2 miles from the S. shore of the Firth of Forth, 43 miles E. by N. of Glasgow, and 393 miles by rail NNW. of London. Lat. 55° 57' N.; lon. 3° 11' W. The city is situated on lofty parallel ridges, and is remarkable for the general elegance of its buildings. It is divided into an Old Town and a New Town. The former is irregular and from its situation on a steep ridge, and the effect produced by its tall houses, very picturesque. The New Town built on a gentler eminence is a remarkably handsome residence district. On the S. of the Old Town, and separated from it by a hollow, stands the remaining portion of the city.

Through the Old Town runs Canongate Street, rising gradually for almost a mile, and rendered most imposing in appearance by the lofty and quaint houses with which it is lined. Between the Old Town and the New stretches Prince's Street, presenting a magnificent view, and forming one of the finest promenades in the world. On the E. the city is overlooked by Calton Hill (349 feet), a rocky eminence commanding an extended view of the Firth of Forth; beyond the E. extremity of the town tower Salisbury Crags, a huge belt of precipitous rock. Immediately behind rises the rocky summit of Arthur's Seat (796 feet), encircled by a carriage-drive. The most remarkable public building in the Old Town is the castle, a mediæval royal residence surmounting an eminence 430 feet high. The Queen Mary portion contains the Scottish regalia. About 1 mile NE. of the castle is the famous royal palace of Holyrood, occupying the site of Holyrood Abbey. Attached to Holyrood is the old royal hunting ground now divided into Queen's Park and Arthur's Seat and open to the public.

Edinburgh contains numerous buildings of note, among the most important of which are: St. Giles' Church, dating from the fifteenth century, and recently restored; the Episcopal Cathedral of St. Mary's (1879), which is one of the largest churches built in Great Britain since the Reformation; the Parliament House, built in 1633, now used as the "Outer House" of the Supreme Courts, and containing many valuable portraits and statues; and the handsome building of Heriot's Hospital, erected in the seventeenth century, and now the seat of a technological school. Among the other edifices of interest are the house of John Knox and the finely situated buildings of the National Gallery, Royal Institution, Museum of Science and Art, National Portrait Gallery and Antiquarian Museum, and Blackford Observatory. The Gothic spire, erected in 1844 in memory of Walter Scott, and the memorial to the Prince Consort (1876) are beautiful monuments.

Edinburgh is rich in its educational institutions. The University, founded in 1582, is one of the most famous in Europe, and counts among its former students some of the most celebrated men of Britain. The present buildings, begun in 1789 from designs by the elder Adam, were completed in 1887 by the erection of a dome. There have been added also in recent years new medical buildings, a students' union, and a college-hall. The University numbers about 3000 students, many of them women; and its library contains about 200,000 volumes and 6000 MSS. There are several other large libraries in Edinburgh, among which the most important are the library of the Faculty of Advocates, containing 500,000 volumes; that of the Society of Writers to the Signet, possessing 90,000 volumes, and a fine public library, erected in 1887-89 by Andrew Carnegie, with about 150,000 volumes. The city contains a number of theological halls connected with its churches and schools. -Edinburgh is remarkable for the exceptionally large funds it receives yearly by bequest from its citizens for educational purposes. That made by George Heriot in the time of Charles I. now yields £30,000 per annum. The Edinburgh Royal Infirmary is one of the best-equipped hospitals in Europe.

The principal industries of Edinburgh are brewing, printing, and publishing, with the subsidiary businesses of book-binding, and type-founding. It is a centre of the paper trade. The port of Edinburgh is Leith. The city is the seat of a bishop of the Scotch Episcopal Church and of an archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church. It sends 4 representatives to parliament.

The climate of Edinburgh is often raw. Mean average temperature of the warmest month, 58° F.; coldest month, 37°.

The name Edinburgh is supposed to be derived from Edwin, King of Northumbria, a Saxon prince, who, in the seventh century, possessed the southern part of Scotland. It was anciently written Edwinesburg or Edwinesburch. The Gaelic name Dun Edin, or Dunedin, is merely a translation of the Saxon name; while its poetical name, Edina, was introduced by George Buchanan. Edinburgh rose into importance in the twelfth century, growing up about the fortress and royal residence on Castle Rock and beside Holyrood Abbey, founded by David I., the burgh which arose around the latter being called the Canongate. The place was long considered a border stronghold. In the course of the fifteenth century, under the Stuart kings, Edinburgh became the capital of Scotland, Parliament being henceforth regularly assembled here. About 1450 walls were built for protection. The rapid growth of the city within the narrow compass of its fortifications caused the erection of dwellings of unprecedented height, built up against the steep hillsides. In 1513 Edinburgh was visited by the plague. In 1532 the College of Justice was established. The town was taken and burnt in 1554 by an English army under the Earl of Hertford, but soon recovered from the consequences of that disaster. On Dec. 3, 1557, the first Covenant was signed in the city; and during the remainder of the sixteenth century it was the scene of numerous interesting events, including many in the history of Queen Mary and in the earlier history of the Reformation, more especially in connection with John Knox, whose house (from a window of which he frequently preached) is still standing, near the top of the Canongate. On Feb. 28, 1638, the National Covenant was signed in the Greyfriars' Church-yard. After the overthrow of Charles I., the Scots having taken up arms in favor of his son, Cromwell invaded their country and took Edinburgh Castle. It remained in the possession of the English till the Restoration. In 1745 the city was taken possession of by the rebels under Prince Charles Edward Stuart. Pop. in 1801, 66,544; in 1831, 136,548; in 1891, 263,646; in 1901, 316,479 (with Leith, 395,373).

Egg Harbor, a post-village of Door co., Wis., in Egg Harbor township (town), on Green Bay, about 31 miles ENE. of Oconto. Pop. of the town in 1900, 882.

Egg Harbor City, a banking city and resort of Atlantic co., N.J., on the Atlantic City and the West Jersey and Seashore Rr., 42 miles SE. of Philadelphia. It has manufactures of cigars, carpets, cut-glass, etc., and is noted for its wines. It was founded by an association of German colonists. Pop. in 1890, 1439; in 1900, 1808.

Egg Island, N.J., in Delaware Bay, has a fixed light. Lat. 39° 10' 24" N.; lon. 75° 9' W.

Eggleston, a post-hamlet of Goodhue co., Minn., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Rr., 13 miles NW. of Red Wing.

Eggleston Springs, a post-village of Giles co., Va., about 60 miles W. of Roanoke. Pop. 75.

Eggmühl. See ECKMÜHL.

Egham, a village of England, co. of Surrey, on the S. side of the Thames, 3 miles below Windsor. Here is the Royal Holloway College for women, one of the most richly endowed institutions of its kind in the world. Adjoining it is the meadow of Runnymede, where King John held the conference which ended in the signing of Magna Charta, A.D. 1215. Pop. of the parish in 1901, 11,894.

Egin, äg'een', a town of Turkish Armenia, on the Euphrates, 22 miles NE. of Arapgir. It is situated in an elevated basin, enclosed by steep rocks. It has substantial houses, surrounded by gardens and orchards. Pop. estimated at between 10,000 and 20,000.

Egina. See KEINA.

Egisheim, äg'his-hime, a village of Alsace, 2 miles W. of Colmar. Pop. 1600.

Eglantine, a post-village of Van Buren co., Ark., 40 miles NW. of Kensett station. Pop. 100.

Eglinton, a post-village of York co., Ontario, 4 miles N. of Toronto.

Eglisau, äg'le-söw', a town of Switzerland, canton and 14 miles N. of Zürich, on the Rhine. Pop. 1200.

Eglon, an ancient city of Palestine, 18 miles ENE. of Gasa. It is identified with the village of Ajlan.

Eglon, a post-village of Preston co., W.Va. The banking point is Oakland, Md.

Egmond-aan-Zee, äg'mont an zä, a village of the Netherlands, in North Holland, on the North Sea, 5 miles W. of Alkmaar. Pop. in 1901, 2603.

Egmondville, a post-village of Huron co., Ontario, 2 miles from Seaford. It has a pottery, tannery, etc. Pop. 500.

Egmont, a beautifully symmetrical and snow-clad volcano of New Zealand, in the SW. part of North Island, 18 miles S. of New Plymouth. Elevation, 8270 feet. Lat. 39° 15' S.; lon. 174° 13' E.

Egmont Bay, an inlet of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the W. coast of Prince Edward Island. Lat. 46° 34' N.

Egmont Bay, a post-village of Prince's co., Prince Edward Island. The banking point is Summerside. Pop. about 150.

Egmont, Cape, on the SE. coast of Prince Edward Island, at the entrance of Egmont Bay. Lat. 46° 28' N.

Egmont Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, in the Low (Tuamotu) Archipelago.

Egmont Island, the largest of the Santa Cruz or Queen Charlotte Islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 10° 53' S.; lon. 165° 50' E. Length, 20 miles.

Egmont (or Six) Islands, in the Indian Ocean, Chagos Archipelago.

Egmont Key, at the entrance to Tampa Bay, W. coast of Florida.

Egna, the Italian for NEUMARKT (Tyrol).

Egnach, äg'näk, a village of Switzerland, canton of Thurgau. Pop. in 1900, 2764.

Egoi Isles, Pacific Ocean. See CAROLINE ISLANDS.

Egremont, a town of England, co. of Cumberland, on the Eden, 6 miles SE. of Whitehaven. It has ruins of a massive Norman castle. There are iron-mines near by. Pop. in 1901, 5761.

Egremont, a township (town) of Berkshire co., Mass., on the New York line. Pop. in 1900, 758.

Egres, äg'grêsh', a village of Hungary, co. of Torontál, on the Maros.

Egreville, äg'h'r-veel', a small town of France, in Seine-et-Marne, 17 miles SSE. of Fontainebleau.

Egripo, or Egripes, an island of Greece. See BUSCEA.

Egripo, or Egripes, a town of Greece. See CHALCIS.

Egyek, äg'yêk', a village of Hungary, on the Theiss, 15 miles NW. of Nádudvár. Pop. in 1901, 4759.

Egypt (Gr. Αἴγυπτος; L. Ægyptus; Hebrew, Misraim; Coptic, Kemi; Arab. Misr or Maasr), a country at the NE. extremity of Africa, nominally forming part of the Turkish empire, but virtually constituting a dependency of England. The Egyptian sovereign pays an annual tribute to the sultan, imposes taxes in the name of the sultan, and places the sultan's name on the national coins. In all matters of internal government, as well as in international affairs, however, Egypt is independent of Turkey, the British government exercising virtual control.

Egypt occupies the valley of the Nile, and extends from the Mediterranean Sea on the north to the 22d parallel of N. lat. on the south (as fixed by the treaty of Jan. 19, 1899), a short distance north of Wadi-Halfa and the Second or Great Cataract, and between the Red Sea on the east and a line on the west which traverses the Libyan Desert, starting from Solun on the Mediterranean and terminating at the southern boundary at about lon. 28° E. Within these limits the region covers an area of nearly 300,000 sq. m., of which barely 11,000, following the course of the Nile and included in the Delta, are capable of cultivation. Egypt adjoins and politically includes the Sinaitic peninsula on the NE., from which it is partly separated by the Gulf of Sues, the Isthmus of Sues forming the connection with the Asiatic continent. The Egyptian Sudan, which extends southward from the true southern boundary of Egypt proper nearly to the equator, is administered jointly by the Egyptian and British governments. See SUDAN, EGYPTIAN.

Face of the Country.—As in ancient times Egypt is still conventionally, and to a degree geographically, divided into two parts of very unequal size,—Lower Egypt, known as Masr-el-Bahri, whose productive area is comprised mainly within the Delta region and extends southward a short distance beyond Cairo; and Upper Egypt, known as Eg-Said, the region of the Nile, extending from near Cairo to the southern boundary. East and west of these productive regions are the sandy and limestone, almost waterless, tracts known respectively as the Arabian (Afro-Arabian) and Libyan deserts. The Arabian Desert, not to be confounded with the desert of the same name of the opposite continent, rises in step-like terraces to lofty plateaus, and is flanked on the immediate borders by a range of granitic and porphyritic mountains, a continuation of the mountain-system of Abyssinia, which attain elevations, as in the Jebel Gharib, Jebel Zebara, and Jebel Hammada, of 5000–6500 feet. The Libyan tract is mainly a monotonous, flat or gently undulating lowland of desert, with a general elevation of 300–400 ft., and constructed superficially of Tertiary limestones. A number of oases are included in this tract, the best known of which are the Fayum, SW. of Cairo; Barieh, about five days' journey SW. of the Fayum; Farafrah, in lat. 27° N.; Siwah (Jupiter Ammon), in the NW.; El-Dakhel, in lat. 25° 30' N.; and El-Khargeh, in lat. 25° N., the largest of the Egyptian oases not contiguous to the Nile, having a north and south extent of about 90 miles. A number of points in this region are depressed below sea-level, as the Sittra Lake, NW. of Barieh (80 ft.), and the oasis of Siwah (100 ft.). The Birket-Kerun, N. of the Fayum, seemingly a reliet of the ancient and much larger Lake Moeris, lies 130 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean; it measures about 35 miles in length. (See MARI.) The oasis or province of the Fayum, sometimes known as the "land of roses," is a region of extreme fertility, which it owes to the passage through it, in numerous ramifications, of the Bahr-Yusuf, or Joseph's Canal, a channel of the Nile which diverges from the main stream above Siut and follows an independent course for upward of 200 miles. Although enclosed by hills of the Libyan Desert, the Fayum might with propriety be considered a part of the Nile region. See FAYUM.

Upper Egypt is practically included in the narrow valley of the Nile, which expands in places to 10-15 miles, and elsewhere contracts to considerably less than 1 mile. In the passage of the river through the Jebel Selselah, below Assuan, it is confined to a gorge measuring only 650 feet in width. The Nile is in this section of its course nowhere more than 3200 feet wide. Lower Egypt is bounded seaward by the great sand flats and reefs which constitute the outer border of the Delta, and through which the two main arms of the Nile, the Rosetta and the Damietta branches, find their way to the sea. Behind these flats, on which are situated Alexandria (in the west), Rosetta, Damietta, and Port Said (in the east), are a series of large brackish lakes or swamps,—Mariut (or Marcotis), Abukir, Edku, Burlos, and Mensaleh, the largest,—which at times receive the flood-discharges from the Nile. The length of the Delta region, measured from near Cairo to a point near Cape Burlos, is 115 miles; its east and west extent is 150 miles. Throughout nearly its entire extent it is traversed by numerous channels and canals, whose overflows, before the construction of the large regulating-works on the Nile, caused widespread destruction over the land. For the characteristics of the Suez region see SUEZ.

The extent of the Delta deposits, which represent the sedimental discharge of the Nile and almost entirely material brought down by the Blue Nile from the Abyssinian highlands, has not yet been definitely ascertained. The Nile soil averages a depth in Egypt of about 33-4' ft., but at Kalyub, at the head of the Delta, it increases to about 50 ft.; borings made at Zagazig have failed to reach bed-rock at a depth of 375 ft. The periodic overflows of the Nile are now held in control and a general level of flow maintained by the great barrage of the Nile, the largest weir in the world, located at Barrage, about 12 miles NW. of Cairo, and the great storage basin above Assuan. For the hydrographic characteristics of the Nile and Delta regions see NILE.

Climate.—The climate of Egypt is characterized by extreme dryness, and is in general healthful, and in the upper regions markedly so. An almost cloudless sky, with intense sunlight, is found for weeks or months at a time. At Cairo there is practically no rainfall (about 1½ inches), and even at Alexandria the yearly fall is only 8 inches. Showers formed in the upper air are frequently dissipated before the water reaches the earth. Cairo counts about 250 absolutely clear days during the year. The average annual temperature at Cairo is 70°, with a mean of 55° for the coldest month (January), and of 84° for the hottest month (June). The mean temperature for Lower Egypt generally is approximately that of Cairo. Alexandria, whose climate is influenced by the presence of the sea, is somewhat warmer in winter and cooler in summer than Cairo. The extremes of temperature, found in the months of January-March and June-August, are 35° (Cairo 31°) and 115°, the intense heat coming with a blowing of the SW. desert-wind, known as the Khamsin. In the further region of the Libyan Desert a temperature of several degrees below the freezing-point has been recorded, as well as an upper maximum of 122°. In Cairo the temperature rarely rises even in the hot months above 95-96°. The climate of Upper Egypt, where desert conditions prevail almost exclusively, is much more markedly torrid than in Lower Egypt, the mean winter temperature rising to 66° and a maximum not rarely to 120°. Owing to the extreme dryness of the atmosphere, by which moisture is almost entirely prevented, malaria is practically unknown, even in the region of sluggish waters and overflows. Much of Egypt has latterly been constituted into a winter and health-resort, the country proving particularly beneficial to those suffering from asthmatic, bronchitic, and rheumatic troubles. The presence of winter cold winds to an extent interferes with the restorative qualities of those parts particularly that are located not very far from the Mediterranean (Alexandria, Cairo).

Natural Resources.—The semi-indigenous flora of Egypt is a restricted one, and necessarily partakes of the characters of the desert flora of Africa generally. The date-palm is pre-eminently the vegetable figure of the land, appearing in all the oases and in extensive groves along the banks of the Nile, even as far south as Fashoda in the Sudan. Its fruit, which ripens in August and September, is largely the sustenance of the native population. The branched dum-palm (Hyphane Thebaica) also extends far to the south, where, on the Upper Nile, it grows in large forests. The commonest of the way-side trees after the palm is the cast or thorn-tree of antiquity, the Acacia Nilotica of botanists. Other vegetal forms are the mulberry, carob or St. John's bread, tamarisk, and Christ's thorn (Zizyphus). Arboriculture has been extensively practised during the last half century, and the hundreds of thousands of trees that have been planted in and about the cities have largely changed the former dreary aspect of the country, and give pleasant shade where before was unobstructed sunshine. Among the introduced trees are the lebbek (Albisia Lebbek), conspicuous by its umbrageousness, poinciana, fig, and blue-gum or eucalyptus. The papyrus and lotus, or water-lily of the Nile, are characteristic plants of the swamps and open waters.

The cultivated fruits include the grape, from which in ancient times much wine was made, pomegranate, orange, lemon, citron, mandarin, fig, almond, and many of the commoner European fruits. The oleander, rose (Rosa Damascena, yielding the attar of roses), geranium, carnation, poinsettia, etc., are largely cultivated for the beauty of their flowers. Egypt is still essentially an agricultural country, and, although no longer a granary with which to supply the foreign world, continues, despite the primitive means of farm-labor which it employs, to produce extensive crops of wheat, corn, barley, and durra (sorghum), the area of land under wheat cultivation comprising more than 20 per cent. of the entire cultivable area. Cotton, introduced from India in 1831, is largely grown in the Delta region, while the sugarcane is extensively cultivated more particularly in Upper Egypt. Of the minor crops, podded fruits, and vegetables may be mentioned the Egyptian clover, lucerne, bean, pea, lentil, pumpkin, cucumber, melon, and many of the common forms of the European table vegetables. Much of the cultivated land of Egypt requires the aid of mechanical irrigation, and the numerous appliances that have been adapted to this purpose (the sabiyek, large wheels turned by cattle or buffaloes, shaduf, the bucket well, etc.) form conspicuous objects in the landscape. The great floods of the Nile reach their maximum, with a height of water of about 40 feet, in the early part of October, shortly after which the planting of the fields begins. There are three agricultural seasons, the winter crop occupying the months from November to April (with the best growth of wheat and barley); the summer crop, the months from April to August (rice, cotton); and the autumn crop, August to October (corn, millet). The cultivation of tobacco, which was formerly an important industry, has virtually ceased.

Geology and Mineral Resources.—The mineral resources of Egypt are insignificant, and even many of the ancient mines, as those yielding emeralds in the Jebel Zohara, copper in the Jebel Fitireh, and turquoise at Maghra, in the Sinaitic peninsula, are no longer worked. The greater part of the land is constructed of Cretaceous, Tertiary (nummulitic), and Post-Tertiary limestones, which fall off gently northward to the Mediterranean, and of the more southern Nubian Sandstone, the age of which has not yet been definitely determined. From the syenitic barrier, which near the site of ancient Syene extends E. and W. for a distance of some 200 miles and precipitates the Nile into the wild cataract of Assuan, the ancient Egyptians obtained much of their granitic material for the construction of temples, obelisks, etc. The material for the colossal structures of Thebes is the Nubian Sandstone, which was quarried near Selselah; that of the Pyramids and of the substantial buildings of Cairo, the nummulitic limestone. The so-highly prized green and red porphyries were obtained from the granitic range which borders the Arabian Desert on the side of the Gulf of Suez. Elevated coral reefs, of late Tertiary or Post-Tertiary age, occur on the coast of the Red Sea, as near Kosseir, at a height of 600-900 feet. The petrified forest near Cairo is one of the geological curiosities of the land.

Animal Life.—The indigenous fauna of Egypt is pre-eminently of the African type, but has in it a strong infusion of European elements and is naturally closely linked with the fauna of western Asia. It is poor in forms, and many of the species that formerly inhabited the region have been either exterminated or have withdrawn to more distant parts. The lion, which figured extensively in ancient times in lion hunts, and the leopard are now but rarely found outside of the Sudan and the Sinaitic peninsula. The hyena and jackal, and the long-eared fennec, are not uncommon. The elephant, as a wild animal, is unknown in Egypt proper, and the hippopotamus, which at one time descended into the Delta region, is no longer met with north of Dongola. Various antelopes and gazelles frequent the desert region, and the ibex and a species of wild sheep inhabit the rocky fastnesses of the Sinaitic peninsula and the Arabian Desert. Among the birds are the Egyptian vulture, sultan bird, flamingo, ibis, and various grouse, partridges, and herons. Poisonous serpents are fairly numerous; the crocodile is now rarely met with in the Nile north of Assuan. The beasts of burden are the ass, horse, and one-humped camel or dromedary; and the buffalo is largely used in farm labor. Neither the camel nor the horse is pictured on the most ancient monuments, the former apparently having been introduced at a comparatively recent period. The rearing of goats and sheep constitutes an important source of wealth to the inhabitants.

Commerce.—Trade is facilitated by an extensive railway system, there having been, at the beginning of 1902, 1393 miles of state railway and 780 miles of agricultural roads operated by private companies. Khartum is now in direct railway communication with Cairo. The government telegraph lines extended at the close of 1901 over 2365 miles. The Suez Canal, which was opened for navigation in November, 1869, has a total length, inclusive of its lakes, of 87 miles. The gross tonnage of vessels passing through it in 1900 was 13,699,238. The Nile and the larger canals are navigated by steamers as well as by freight-boats. Egypt has a large trade with the eastern Sudan and other parts of the interior of Africa, and the slave-trade was carried on until virtually wiped out by English influence and effort. Cotton, sugar, pulses, wheat, ivory, gums, oil-seeds, and senna are exported. The value of textile materials, mainly raw cotton, exported in 1901, was £11,892,397; of cereals and vegetables, £2,649,970.

Government.—The government of Egypt is a hereditary monarchy, whose head is called the khedive,—i.e., "lord" or "prince." In addition to khedive of Egypt, this prince styles himself lord of Nubia, the Sudan, Kordofan, and Darfur. In 1867 the title of khedive was conferred on the viceroy, Ismail Pasha, by the sultan of Turkey, and in 1873 full rights of sovereignty were granted; but the khedive pays to Turkey an annual tribute of $3,300,000. The powers of the ruler are absolute, but the public administrative functions are regulated by a council of state. The Egyptian ministry is composed of 6 members, whose departments are those of the interior, finance, justice, war, public works and public instruction, and foreign affairs. The English financial adviser, without whose concurrence no financial decision can be taken, has a seat in the council of ministers, without, however, being an executive officer. Through him the English government exercises virtual control over the administration of Egypt. There are a legislative council and a general assembly, in part chosen by the people, but their functions are mainly of an advisory nature. Many of the officials, civil and military, are of foreign birth, the English predominating. An Englishman, who bears the title of sirdar, is at the head of the Egyptian army. Egypt is divided into provinces, styled mudiriya (the governor being called mudir). There are also several governorships for the more important cities, which have a local administration. The official language is Arabic. The capital of the country is Cairo.

Ancient Remains.—Egypt far surpasses all other countries in the architectural remains of its remote past. The dryness and equability of the climate and the wonderfully substantial and ponderous character of the ruins have alike tended to preserve them from destruction. Even Moslem superstition, which utterly destroyed nearly every Roman town in north Africa, had not the strength to do more than deface the pyramids and temples of Egypt. Among the more interesting remains are the Pyramids (especially those of Ghizeh), the Sphinx, and the temples of Thebes (Luxor, Karnak), Philæ, Denderah, and Edfu. Of even greater interest are the relics of the old Egyptian literature, recorded in hieroglyphics on walls and on papyrus rolls. The translation of these records is unfolding, in a remarkable way, not merely the national annals, but also the story of the daily life, the religious beliefs, and the philosophic speculations of a wonderful people, one of the earliest to receive anything like a true civilization. The group of mummies of the sovereigns of ancient Egypt, now in the museum of Cairo, is a contribution of the more recent exploration of the land.

Inhabitants.—The population of Egypt is heterogeneous. The old Egyptian race is represented by the Fellahs (in whom there is a great admixture of the blood of invaders and immigrants) and by the Copts. The Fellahs, who constitute the bulk of the population, are mainly agriculturists. They speak an Arabic dialect and are Mohammedans. The Copts, who are mainly townspeople, speak a language descended from the ancient Egyptian and are Christians, the great bulk of them belonging to the Coptic church. The Arabs constitute an important element in the cities. There are large numbers of Bedouins. The recent development of European civilization has called in many foreigners,—French, Italian, Greek, Maltese, English, and German. In 1897 the population (including Nubia) was 9,821,045, of which 112,526 were foreigners (58,175 Greeks). The principal towns are Cairo, with a population in 1897, of 576,400; Alexandria, 319,766 (in 1902, estimated at 810,507); Tanta, 57,399; Port Said, 42,095; and Siut or Assut, 42,012.

History.—The period of Egyptian history covered by the inscriptions on the monuments reaches back 4000 or 5000 years before the beginning of the Christian era. The age of the Great Pyramid of Khufu (Cheops) at Ghizeh is between 5000 and 6000 years. The early seat of power was at Memphis, in Lower Egypt, which was supplanted by Thebes, in Upper Egypt. The period of the greatest power and splendor of Egypt covers about four centuries, terminating about 1250 B.C., when the so-called New Empire was under the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. At this time Egypt was mistress of Syria and had close diplomatic relations with Assyria and Babylonia. Among the kings whose military deeds and architectural and engineering works shed lustre upon the Egypt of this period were Thothmes III., Amenhotep III., Seti I., Ramesses II., and Ramesses III. The country was conquered by Persia about 527 B.C. Alexander the Great conquered it in 332 B.C., and founded Alexandria, which, under the Greek dynasty of the Ptolemies, was long the greatest seat of civilization in the world. The country passed under the sway of Rome in 30 B.C. After the final division of the Roman Empire in A.D. 395 it formed part of the Byzantine Empire.

In A.D. 639–641 the Arabs effected the conquest of Egypt, which, under its Mohammedan rulers, soon became totally changed. In 1250 the government was seized by the Mamelukes (originally slaves, chiefly from the Caucasus, bred to military service), who had grown into power by the favor of Saladin. These were subdued by Selim I., the Ottoman sultan, who became master of Egypt in 1517. When, in the first half of the eighteenth century, the Ottoman empire was hard pressed by Russia and Austria, Egypt again fell under the turbulent sway of the Mamelukes, who continued to retain the sovereign power during the French invasion in 1798. The ambitious viceroy, Mehemet Ali, treacherously exterminated the Mamelukes in 1811. He subjugated the sect of the Wahabis in Arabia, and in 1820–22 he conquered Nubia. He waged war for the possession of Syria (1831–32), which he held for a time. In a second war with the Porte, begun in 1839, he would have made himself master of Constantinople but for the intervention of the European powers. He was forced to give up Syria, but was recognized by the sultan as hereditary, though tributary, ruler of Egypt. Subsequent events have been the construction of the Suez Canal, the conferring of the regal distinction upon the Egyptian ruler (Ismail Pasha being named Khedive in 1867), the wars of conquest in the upper Nile valley and the Sudan, the deposition of the Khedive Ismail in 1879 and the appointment of his son, Tewfik Pasha, as his successor, the Anglo-French control (1879–83), the rebellion of Arabi Pasha (1882), the English armed intervention and the overthrow of Arabi, the installation of a British control of the finances, bringing in its train the permanent military occupation of the country by the British, the revolt of the Mahdists in the Sudan, and the re-establishment of Egyptian sway in that region through the British arms in 1898. The present khedive, Abbas Hilmi, ascended the throne in 1892.

Egypt, a post-village of Effingham co., Ga., on the Central of Georgia R., 40 miles NW. of Savannah.

Egypt, a post-village of Plymouth co., Mass., 2 miles N. of Scituate. Pop. 200.

Egypt, a post-village of Chickasaw co., Miss., on the Mobile and Ohio R., 76 miles S. of Corinth. Pop. about 100.

Egypt, a post-village of Monroe co., N.Y., 14 miles SE. of Rochester. Pop. 250.

Egypt, a post-village of Lehigh co., Pa., 2 miles by rail W. of Coplay. It has manufactures of cement, etc. Pop. about 850.

Egypt, a post-hamlet of Lincoln co., Wash.

Egypt, a post-hamlet of Wayne co., W.Va.

Egyptian Sudan. See SUDAN, EGYPTIAN.

Egypt Mills, a post-hamlet of Cape Girardeau co., Mo., 9 miles N. of Cape Girardeau.

Egypt Mills, a post-hamlet and resort of Pike co., Pa.

Ehen, c'hen, called also Eken, a river of England, co. of Cumberland, flows through the Ennerdale, past Egremont, and thence S. to the Irish Sea.

Ehime, one of the four official districts of the island of Shikoku, Japan.

Ehingen, A'ing-en, a town of Württemberg, 15 miles SW. of Ulm. Pop. in 1900, 4734.

Eholt, a post-village of British Columbia, on the Canadian Pacific R. The banking point is Greenwood, 15 miles distant.

Ehrang, á'ráng, a town of Prussia, Rhine province, 4 miles NE. of Treves, near the confluence of the Kyll with the Moselle. Pop. in 1900, 2960.

Ehrem, a post-village of Pasco co., Fla. The banking point is St. Petersburg. Pop. about 100.

Ehrenberg, air'en-bé're, a village of Bohemia, 25 miles NE. of Leitmeritz and near Schluckenau. Pop. in 1900, 3201; of the commune, 4715.

Ehrenberg, a post-village of Yuma co., Ariz., on the Colorado River, 130 miles above Yuma.

Ehrenbreitstein, air'en-brit'stine, a town of Rhenish Prussia; immediately opposite Coblenz. It is situated at the foot of a rocky hill, nearly 400 feet in elevation, which commands extensive views of the Rhine and is crowned by a great fortress whose defences are supplemented by other works in the vicinity. The old fortress of Ehrenbreitstein was demolished by the French after the peace of Lunéville, and the new one was constructed immediately after the close of the Napoleonic wars. Pop. of the town in 1900, 5303.

Ehrenfeld, air'en-félt', a former town of Prussia, now incorporated with Cologne.

Ehrenfeld, a post-village of Cambria co., Pa. The banking point is Johnstown.

Ehrenfels, air'en-fels', a ruined castle on the Rhine, in the Prussian district of Wiesbaden, between Rüdesheim and Assmannshausen.

Ehrenfriedersdorf, air'en-free'ders-dorf', a town of Saxony, on the slope of the Sanberg, 1500 feet above the sea, 44 miles SW. of Dresden. Near by are the picturesque granite masses of the Greifenstein. Pop. in 1900, 4661.

Ehrhardt, a post-town of Bamberg co., S.C. The banking point is Bamberg or Walterboro. Pop. in 1900, 215.

Ehrmandale, a post-village of Vigo co., Ind. The banking point is Terre Haute. Pop. about 350.

Eibar, á'e-bar, a town of Spain, in Guipúzcoa, district of Vergara. Pop. (commune) in 1900, 6583.

Eibau, i'báw, or Alt-Eibau, a village of Saxony, 11 miles NW. of Zittau, near the Bohemian frontier. Pop. in 1900, 4665. Closely adjoining is the village of Neu-Eibau.

Eibelstadt, i'bel-státt', a town of Bavaria, in Lower Franconia, on the Main, 5 miles SE. of Würzburg. Pop. in 1900, 1159.

Area (including the inland waters), 50,990 sq. m.; with Wales, 58,324 sq. m. With the exception of Belgium, England and Wales constitute the most thickly-peopled country in Europe, the average to a square mile at the last census having been about 558. In 1801 the population of England and Wales was 8,892,536; in 1831 it was 13,896,797; in 1861, 20,066,234; in 1891, 29,002,526; and in 1901, 32,527,843. The population of England alone in 1901 was 30,807,243. The following is a table of the ancient counties of England and Wales, with their population in 1901.

Since 1888 considerable changes have been made in the administrative divisions, mainly through the creation of a large number of county boroughs (municipal counties), whose areas range between 2½ and 36 sq. m. Lincolnshire has been divided into 3 administrative divisions, called the Parts of Holland, Kesteven, and Lindsey. Suffolk has been divided into East and West Suffolk and Sussex into East and West Sussex; the Soke of Peterborough has been set off from Northamptonshire; the Isle of Wight, formerly included in Hampshire, has been constituted a separate administrative county; the county of London (not including the whole of the metropolis) has been constituted out of portions of Middlesex, Surrey, Essex, and Kent.

The following cities had a population exceeding 200,000 in 1901: London (the capital), Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, Bradford, West Ham (included in the police district of London), Hull (Kingston-upon-Hull), Nottingham, Salford, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Leicester.

Face of the Country.—The surface of England is mountainous in the N. and W. The Cheviot Hills form the greater part of the boundary between the county of Northumberland and Scotland. The Pennine Chain, a fairly rugged highland with elevations in most places not exceeding 1000 feet, extends southward from the neighborhood of the river Tyne to nearly the middle of the country, and is sometimes referred to as the "Backbone of England." The highest elevation of these uplands is Cross Fell, in Cumberland, 2892 ft. To the Pennine Chain belongs the picturesque region of Derbyshire known as the Peak, which rises in the Kinder Scout to a height of 2088 ft. The loftiest elevations of all England are the Cumbrian Mountains, in which is situated the famous Lake District. The highest summits here are Sca Fell (or Scawfell) Pike, 3210 ft.; Sca Fell, 3162 ft.; Helvellyn, 3118 ft.; and Skiddaw, 3058 ft. Moderately high and rugged elevations are found in the SW. in Cornwall and Devonshire, the Yes Tor, NW. of Dartmoor, rising to about 2060 ft. The E. and SE. are comparatively low, the surface rarely rising above 500 ft. Around the Wash is a large area of low-lying alluvium, a portion of which is known as the Bedford Level. The S. of England is largely occupied by rolling country, which towards the coast constitutes the series of "downs," partially underlain by chalk, and known as the North Downs and South Downs.

Few of the rivers of England have any great length, but many, even the minor ones, are of commercial importance. The principal streams are the Thames, Severn, Trent, and Ouse (tributaries of the Humber River or estuary), Mersey, Tyne, and Tees. All of these streams are connected by canals, forming an extensive system of intercommunicating waters. The lakes of England are restricted chiefly to the NW. Among the best known are Windermere, on the borders of Lancashire and Westmorland, and Derwentwater, in Cumberland. The lakes, with the surrounding mountains, form the most attractive scenery of the interior of the land. The rock shore-line of Cornwall and Devon has long been famous for its scenic aspects, which are also shared in part by the chalk cliffs between the Isle of Wight and Dover.

The climate of England is of an insular nature, characterised by moderate extremes of temperature and by a pronounced humidity. Its broad features are those of the climate of the British Isles generally, where the average temperature for the year is about 48°. The warmest month is generally July, with an average temperature of about 64° at London. The winter is ordinarily mild, with January as the coldest month, the average temperature at London being about 39°. The rainfall is in some parts—as in the Lake District, in Cornwall, and in Devon—high, ranging to 60–80 inches and upward; in the valley of the Thames it is but 25 inches. Fogs are very frequent. The snowfall is ordinarily not very heavy. For Geology, Fauna, and Flora, see GREAT BRITAIN.

Mineral Resources.—About three-quarters of the entire mineral production of the United Kingdom is furnished by England, the major values being those obtained from coal, iron-ores, building-stones, clays, salt, tin, and lead. Copper, arsenic, zinc, gypsum, heavy-spar, etc., are found in minor quantities. The coal-measures occupy parts of a large number of the counties, from the south through the west and west-centre to the extreme north. In 1902 the coal production of England without Wales was 159,080,000 tons, of which Durham produced 35,000,000 tons, Yorkshire 28,000,000 tons, and Lancashire 24,500,000 tons. Most of the salt of England is obtained in Cheshire, in the basin of the Weaver; while nearly the whole of the tin product is obtained from the mines of Cornwall. The total value of the mineral product in the year 1900 was £93,722,160.

Manufactures, etc.—England is next to the United States the greatest manufacturing country in the world. The leading industries include the manufacture of textile fabrics (cottons, woollens, silks, carpets), iron and steel products of every kind, machinery, steam-engines and locomotives, iron ships, electrical apparatus, chemicals, pottery and earthenware, clothing, boots and shoes, paper, hosiery, hats, gloves, lace, ale and porter, carriages, and gold- and silver-ware. Among the leading centres of the cotton-industry are Manchester (with Salford), Oldham, Preston, Blackburn, Ashton-under-Lyne, Bolton, Bury, and Rochdale, all in Lancashire. This industry is also prominent in some of the adjacent counties. Yorkshire is the chief seat of the woollen-industry, Huddersfield, Bradford, Leeds, and Dewsbury being among the leading centres. Wiltshire produces high-grade woollens. Halifax and Kidderminster, in Yorkshire, are great centres of the carpet-manufacture. The counties of Derby, Stafford, and Chester produce most of the silk, the manufacture of which has greatly declined. Birmingham and Sheffield have long enjoyed a high reputation for their iron and steel manufactures, notably hardware and cutlery. The former produces great quantities of fire-arms, pens, and miscellaneous metallic wares. Other important seats of the manufacture of metallic products are Wolverhampton, Bradford, Leeds, Bolton, Oldham, and Stockton. Newcastle-upon-Tyne is noted for its locomotive, engineering- and ordnance-works. Birkenhead, Hartlepool, Sunderland, Barrow-in-Furness, Stockton-on-Tees, South and North Shields, and Middlesbrough are ship-building seats. Nottingham and Leicester are the chief centres of the hosiery-manufacture, and the former produces the so-called Nottingham lace on a large scale. The chief seats of the boot- and shoe-industry are Northampton and Leicester. The ale of Burton-upon-Trent and the London porter are famous. Straw-plaiting is an important industry in the counties of Bedford, Hertford, and Buckingham. The manufacture of pottery is largely a speciality of Staffordshire, the district of the "Potteries," about Burslem, being intimately associated with the name of Wedgwood. England (with Wales) represents 90 per cent. of the total imports and exports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The value of the imports into England and Wales in 1902 was £476,000,000, that of the exports (including foreign and colonial), £316,000,000. The chief sea-ports of England and Wales are London, Liverpool, Cardiff, Newcastle, Hull, Southampton, Newport, Swansea, Dover, and Bristol. The total length of operated railway in England and Wales in 1901 was 15,187 miles; of canals, 3167 miles. The great Manchester Ship Canal, opened in 1894, is 35½ miles in length. See GREAT BRITAIN.

Agriculture, etc.—Agriculture has attained high eminence in England, and about 25,000,000 acres, or 76 per cent. of the full area of the land, are under crop-cultivation or in grass-lands, and only about 4,000,000 acres (about 12 per cent.) remain absolutely uncultivated. The heath and grazing country comprises 2,250,000 acres. Wheat is the principal crop, especially in the E. and SE. counties, and in 1900 its cultivation covered 1,744,556 acres; barley, which is cultivated but little less extensively than wheat, is raised chiefly in the central counties; and oats in the N., though cultivated more or less in all parts of the country. Pease, beans, potatoes, and turnips are the crops next in importance. Rye and buckwheat are not extensively cultivated; rape, flax, hemp, and mangel-wurzel are raised only in certain parts. Hops are nearly confined to Kent, Herefordshire, Surrey, Sussex, and Worcestershire, the number of acres under this crop being about 50,000. The total acreage under cultivation in Great Britain, chiefly in England, with green crops was, in 1901, 3,129,198; with corn-crops, 7,133,708. Near the large towns the ground is commonly laid out in market-gardens, and in Bedfordshire an extensive district is appropriated to growing vegetables for the London market. In the SW. counties large quantities of apples are grown, and Devon and Hereford are famous for cider. Butter is an important product in Essex, Cambridgeshire, and Dorset; cheese in Cheshire, Gloucester, Wiltshire, Somerset, etc. The Durham or short-horned, Devon, Hereford, Jersey, and Alderney are the most noted breeds of cattle. The annual product of wool is very large. Swine are very generally kept, and are especially numerous in the forest-lands of Hampshire, Berkshire, Gloucester, and Hereford. Geese are raised largely, especially in the Lincoln fens, for the London market. For the various statistics dealing with the products, etc., of the British Isles see GREAT BRITAIN.

England is much less wooded than most of the countries of continental Europe. Only about 1,650,000 acres, or barely more than 5 per cent. of the total area, remain in woodland. Of the royal forest lands some of the largest are the New Forest in Hampshire, the forests of Epping (Essex), Sherwood (Kent), and Dean (Gloucester). Many parts of the wealds of Sussex, Surrey, and Kent have remained wooded ever since the time of the Romans. England is largely engaged in the fisheries, the value of the fish-product (inclusive of that of Wales) for the year 1901 having been upward of £6,500,000, estimated on a catch of nearly 400,000 tons.

Religion and Education.—The established church of England is the Protestant Episcopal, to which the great mass of the people belong. The sovereign is the head of the Anglican Church, having the right to nominate to bishoprics and archbishoprics. The church is governed by 2 archbishops and 33 bishops, besides a number of suffragan and coadjutant bishops, and has about 14,000 parishes or benefices, in each of which there is a church, presided over by a rector or vicar, who holds the living. The Anglican archbishoprics are those of Canterbury and York. The archbishop of Canterbury is primate and metropolitan of all England, and crowns the monarch. The archbishop of York is styled primate and metropolitan of England, and crowns the queen-consort. The doctrines of the church are embodied in the Thirty-Nine Articles, and, having been ratified by Parliament, cannot be changed without its consent. The most numerous dissenting bodies are the Wesleyan Methodists, Congregationalists, and Baptists. The Roman Catholics (including those of Wales) number about 1,500,000, with 1672 (in 1901) chapels and stations. The highest dignity of the Roman Catholic church is the archbishop of Westminster.

At the head of the educational system of England stand the ancient national universities of Oxford and Cambridge, two of the most celebrated institutions in the world. They are almost exclusively for the wealthier classes, and, till a comparatively recent period, were only for members of the Church of England. Prominent among the institutions of learning are the universities of London and Durham; King's College, London; Victoria University, Manchester; and the Birmingham University. Besides these there are numerous theological colleges or seminaries, attached to most of which are professors in the faculties of arts and philosophy. There are many colleges and institutions for imparting professional or technical training. At the head of these stands the South Kensington School and Museum, with the Art Museum, the India Museum, and various science collections, and extensive art and science libraries. The Royal College of Physicians and the Royal College of Surgeons (London) are world-renowned, as are also the School of Mines (now the Royal School of Science), the Royal Institution, and the Royal Academy. All of these, together with many other colleges and technical schools, are in London. There are royal military academies at Woolwich and Sandhurst, a royal naval college at Greenwich, and an agricultural college at Cirencester.

At the head of secondary education stand the great public schools,—notably Eton, Harrow, Rugby, and Marlborough. These schools are richly endowed and have long had a high repute for classical training. For the middle classes there are numerous grammar-schools and private seminaries. Bedford College, London, and the Royal Holloway College, at Egham, are exclusively for female students. Unattached university colleges for women are Newnham and Girton Colleges, at Cambridge, and Lady Margaret Hall and Somerville College, at Oxford.

Government.—See GREAT BRITAIN.

History.—England (together with the southern portion of Scotland) was known to the ancients as Britannia. The ancient inhabitants, the Britons, were a Celtic people. Cæsar made two war-like expeditions to Britain in 55 and 54 B.C., and a century later the conquest of the country was undertaken by the Emperor Claudius. In A.D. 78-81 Agricola advanced the Roman frontiers to the Firth of Forth, the country to the N. of which, Caledonia (the highland region of Scotland), retained its independence. The Romans introduced their civilization into Britain, which they held till the beginning of the fifth century, when they were compelled to withdraw their legions. About the middle of the fifth century the Britons called upon the Teutonic peoples dwelling about the mouth of the Elbe and in Jutland—Saxons, Angles, and Jutes—for aid in repelling the inroads of the Picts and Scots living north of Hadrian's wall. After clearing the country of these northern invaders, the Germans turned upon the Britons themselves and occupied most of their country, driving them out or exterminating them. The Jutes founded the kingdom of Kent; the Saxons, the kingdoms of Sussex, Wessex, and Essex; the Angles, the kingdoms of Northumbria, East Angles, and Mercia, Northumbria extending as far N. as the Firth of Forth. The ancient Britons were left only Wales, Cornwall, Cumberland, and the southwest of Scotland. About 827 Egbert, King of Wessex, became overlord of all England. Previous to this, in the seventh century, all the land had become Christian, mainly through the labors of St. Augustine and of Irish and Scottish missionaries. In the second half of the ninth century the Danes (Northmen) conquered Northumbria, East Angles, and Mercia. The early part of the reign of Alfred the Great (871-901) was spent in continual and ultimately successful struggles against these invaders. Alfred established order on the basis of constitutional law and exerted himself to civilise his subjects. In 1013 Swegen, King of Denmark, made himself master of England. His son Canute reigned after him, and was followed by his two sons. In 1042 the English people returned to their native royal dynasty under Edward the Confessor. In 1066 William, Duke of Normandy, invaded England and achieved its conquest by his victory at Hastings. He distributed much of the land of England among his Norman followers, while Norman-French became the language of the court, of law-proceedings, and of the schools. A hundred years later, under Henry II., the first of the Plantagenets (with whose accession, in 1154, a large part of France was united with England), the conquest of Ireland was begun. Under John, the brother and successor of Richard Cœur de Lion, England lost nearly all her French dominions. In 1215 the barons extorted from John the Magna Charta, which has been styled the charter of English liberties. Edward I. signalized his reign by the conquest of Wales (1277-83), and he struggled strenuously and almost successfully to establish the suzerainty of England over Scotland. At Bannockburn (1314), King Robert Bruce overwhelmed the army of Edward II., and established the independence of Scotland. In 1338, under Edward III., began the wars of the English for the conquest of France. After a struggle of over a hundred years, in the course of which the French kingdom was brought to the verge of dissolution, the tide of war turned, and by 1451 the English had been dispossessed of their conquests with the exception of the town of Calais, which remained in their hands a century longer. Under Henry VIII., the second king of the Tudor dynasty (1509-47) England broke away from Rome, and under Elizabeth (1558-1603), Protestantism was firmly established. The title of King of Ireland was formally assumed by Henry VIII. in 1542. With the reign of Elizabeth begins England's career as a great colonizing power. In 1603 the crowns of England and Scotland were united under the Stuarts, and in 1707 the two kingdoms were united into the single realm of Great Britain. In 1714 the House of Hanover (Brunswick) ascended the throne, and for more than a century Hanover was united with England. In 1759-60 Canada was wrested from the French, and simultaneously the English laid the foundations of their empire in India. A little later the colonies which had been planted by the English in America made themselves independent. The legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland dates from 1801. The first half of the nineteenth century witnessed the establishment of British dominion in South Africa, the rise of the Australian colonies, and the extension of British dominion in India westward to the Indus. In the second half of the century England established her sway over a considerable part of Africa and annexed the kingdom of Burma.

Erfurt, ɛr'fōrt (L. Erphordia and Erfurtum), a town of Prussian Saxony, capital of the governmental district of the same name, on the Gera, 14 miles E. of Gotha. It has many quaint corners, with houses dating from the time of the Renaissance. There are a number of bridges over the three arms of the Gera, one of which is lined on either side with houses and shops. Erfurt has interesting old churches, the most noteworthy of which is the mediæval cathedral. In one of its towers is a bell weighing 275 cwt. Among other buildings are the Augustinian convent, of which Luther was a member, now an orphanage and home for poor children, and the modern town-hall. The public library has 65,000 volumes and a valuable collection of mediæval manuscripts. Erfurt is an important industrial centre. The leading manufactures are those of women's cloaks and of shoes. There is a large royal manufactory of fire-arms. The place is noted for its vegetable and flower gardens and seed-raising establishments. Erfurt was one of the most prosperous commercial towns of central Germany in the Middle Ages. A university was established here as early as 1392, which existed down to 1816. In the seventeenth century the town passed under the sway of the archbishops of Mainz, who held it down to the beginning of the nineteenth century. Napoleon and Alexander I. of Russia, together with a number of minor potentates, held a congress here in 1808. The so-called Unionsparliament of North Germany met at Erfurt in 1850. Previous to 1873 Erfurt was a fortress. Pop. in 1880, 53,254; in 1900, 85,202.

Ergaste'ria, or Laurion, lɑ'r-re-on (Laurium), a town of Greece, on the SE. coast of Attica, opposite the island of Makronisi, 7 miles by rail from the mines of Laurium and 40 miles by rail SE. of Athens. The town, whose name (Ergasteria) signifies "work-shops," is less than half a century old, and owes its existence to the resurrection of the mining-industry carried on here by the ancient Greeks. The mines of Laurium in antiquity were especially famous for their yield of silver. At the present time the chief product obtained here is lead, the yield of cadmium, manganese, and silver being also large. The utilization of the refuse and scoriae left from the ancient mines has formed an important part of the recent operations. Many of the ancient workings are in the condition in which they were left at the beginning of the Christian era. Pop. of the town (including its port) in 1896, 7926.

Erie, Lake, one of the five great lakes drained by the St. Lawrence River, forms part of the boundary between the United States and Canada. It is the most shallow of these great depressions in the basin of the St. Lawrence, and is chiefly supplied with water which comes from lakes Superior, Michigan, and Huron through the Detroit River. Lake Erie washes the coasts of Michigan, Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania, which it separates from Ontario, Canada, the United States-Canada boundary traversing the lake. It is about 240 miles long, and has a mean breadth of 40 miles, the greatest breadth being about 58 miles. The greatest ascertained depth is said to be 270 feet, and the mean depth not more than 120 feet. The surface is elevated 573 feet above the level of the sea. It has an area of 9960 sq. m. The largest affluents of the lake, besides the Detroit River, are the Maumee, Sandusky, Raisin, and Cuyahoga rivers, and the Grand River in Ontario. Its water is discharged through the Niagara River, which issues from the northeastern end of the lake and connects it with Lake Ontario. The principal towns and harbors on this very important channel of commerce are Buffalo, Dunkirk, Erie, Cleveland, Sandusky, and Toledo. The Erie Canal extends from Buffalo to Albany, and connects this lake with the Hudson River. Other connecting-waters are the Welland Canal, uniting with Lake Ontario; the Ohio Canal, between Cleveland and Portsmouth on the Ohio River; the Miami and Erie Canal, uniting Toledo with Cincinnati. The navigation of the lake is closed by ice for several months in winter. Violent storms prevail here in some seasons of the year, especially in November and December, often accompanied with disastrous shipwrecks. The battle of Lake Erie, in which Commodore Perry won a great victory over the British, was fought in Put-in-Bay, between Toledo and Cleveland, Sept. 10, 1813.

Esquimaux, de'ke-mo or de'ke-mòs, now more generally written Eskimos (i.e., "eaters of raw flesh"), the present inhabitants (chiefly) of Arctic America and Greenland, consisting of three principal stocks,—the Kalalits, better known by the name of Greenlanders; the Esquimaux proper, on the N. and E. coast of Labrador; and the western Esquimaux, found along Hudson Bay, the W. side of Baffin Bay, the polar shores of America as far as the mouths of the Coppermine and Mackenzie rivers, and on both the American and Asiatic sides of Bering Strait. This last locality gives them the remarkable peculiarity of being the only aboriginal race common to the Old and the New World. Their physical peculiarities are a stunted stature, although many male individuals attain a height of nearly or quite 6 feet, flattened nose, projecting cheek-bones, thick lips, eyes often oblique, and yellow and brownish skin. In summer they live in skin-tents (tupics); in winter they construct stone- and ice-houses (igdlus or igloos). Their chief dependence for food is on fishing, particularly on that of the seal. Their weapons are bows and arrows and spears or lances, generally pointed with stones or bones, but now frequently with metal. Their language consists of long compound words, and has regular though remarkable inflections: in grammatical structure, at least, it is American. In intellect they are by no means deficient, and the success of the Danish missionaries proves their capability of receiving Christianity, understanding its truths, and conforming to its precepts. The Esquimaux of Greenland number some 12,000–15,000 in the Danish possessions; those beyond Melville Bay, or Cape York, the true Greenlanders or "Arctic Highlanders," hardly exceed 300. Their habitations or remains have been found as far north as the 80th parallel of latitude. The original home of the Esquimaux still remains a mooted question with ethnologists, many of whom believe them to be of the same racial stock as the American Indian.

Ethiopia, e-thē-ō'pē-ā (L. Æthiopia; Gr. Αἰθιοπία, Æthiopia), the name given by the ancient geographers to the countries S. of Egypt; the land of Cush of the Bible. It was often vaguely applied to the whole of Africa from the Red Sea to the Atlantic Ocean, or, to speak more correctly, as far W. as the knowledge of the ancients extended. So great was the power of the ancient Ethiopians that more than once in its history Egypt was governed by Ethiopian kings, while the most powerful kings of Egypt do not seem at any time to have acquired a permanent hold upon Ethiopia. The most celebrated seat of power was Meroë, the ruins of which are to be seen on the Nile, not far above the influx of the Atbara. The kingdom of Meroë existed down to about the beginning of the Christian era. In later times the name of Ethiopia came to designate the Christian kingdom in Abyssinia, whose capital was Axum, which developed into the modern kingdom of Abyssinia, still styled Ethiopia in the parlance of the court. The Ethiopic language, a Semitic tongue, commonly known as Gees, has long been a dead language, its use being still retained, however, in the Abyssinian Church.

Etna, é'tná (L. Ætna; Sicilian, Mongibello, mon-jé-bél'lo, a corruption of the Gibbel Uttamat, or "mountain of fire," of the Saracens), a volcano in the NE. of Sicily, near the coast, and within a short distance of Catania. The loftiest summit is in lat. 37° 43' N., lon. 15° E., and is, as determined by measurement made in 1897, 10,755 feet above sea-level. The base covers an area of nearly 90 miles in circumference, and is almost encircled by the rivers Alcantara and Simeto, the sea marking its limits on the E. The dimensions of the crater have varied considerably, but at this time appear to be about 1730 feet in greatest width, with a depth of 825 feet. Although, when viewed from a distance, Etna presents a very symmetrical cone, it is found, on a nearer approach, to have an exceedingly diversified surface and to be studded on its flanks by numerous minor cones. The great terminating cone, at the summit of which is the principal crater, rises from an irregular plain 9 miles in circumference and about 1100 feet below the culminating point. About 80 eruptions of Etna are recorded in history, the earliest being in the year 476 (477?) B.C.; the more remarkable ones of later periods are those of 1169 (when Catania was in greater part destroyed), 1527, 1669, 1693, 1792, 1812, 1819, 1832, 1843, 1852, 1865, 1879, 1886, and 1892, a new crater being opened in the last-named year near Monte Gemellaro. The eruption of 1792 continued for a whole year; the streams of lava which flowed from the mountain on that occasion were often 30 feet high while in their fluid state. In the eruption of 1832, numerous craterlets opened in the sides of the mountain, from which, in the midst of violent explosions and tremendous discharges of ashes and cinders, issued a stream of lava 18 miles in length, 1 mile broad, and 30 feet high. The eruption of 1669 hurled its lava into Catania, a part of which city it destroyed. The eruption of 1693, with its accompanying earthquakes, is said to have cost the lives of upward of 60,000 people. At the foot of the cone of Mount Etna, 9652 feet above the sea, is the Casa Etna or Observatorio, affording accommodation to tourists. This house is covered with snow till the middle of June, and fresh snow falls on it in August. An interesting geological feature of the volcano is the Val or Valle del Bove, an amphitheatric abyss about 3 miles in length and flanked by cliffs 3000-4000 feet high. Considerable snow rests throughout the year on the summit of the volcano, the slopes of which up to a great height are wooded with oak, beech, chestnut, and pine.—Adj. ETNEAN, é't-neo'an (L. Ætnæus).

Ettrick-Pen, a mountain of Scotland, near the source of the Ettrick River.

Ettricks, a post-village of Chesterfield co., Va., 14 miles SE. of Chesterfield. Pop. about 950.

Ettrek, ét'tyék', a village of Hungary, co. of Stuhlweissenburg, 12 miles from Mátyásvár.

Etzatlan, a town of Mexico, in the state of Jalisco, 52 miles W. of Guadalajara. Pop. in 1895, 6753.

Eu, uh (L. Auga or Augium), a town of France, in Seine-Inférieure, on the Bresle, near the English Channel, 3 miles SE. of Le Tréport and 17 miles NNE. of Dieppe. The church of St. Laurent is a fine mediæval edifice. Here are a magnificent castle and park. Near by is the forest of Eu. Pop. about 4500 (commune, 5300).

Eubanks, a post-village of Pulaski co., Ky., on the Queen and Crescent Route. The banking point is Somerset. Pop. 150.

Eubæa, yu-bæ'-a, or Negropont (L. Eubæa; Gr. Ἐβία; mod. Gr. Ἐβία and Ἐγρίπο), whence the It. Negroponte, nâ'g-ro-pôn'tâ), the largest island of the kingdom of Greece, in the Ægean Sea, lying along the coast of Attica, Boeotia, and Locria. It is separated from the mainland on the SW. by a long narrow channel, the northwestern part of which (the channel of Atalanti) was called by the ancients the Eubæan Sea, and to the narrowest part of which they gave the name of Euripus, and on the NW. by the channels of Oreos and Trikeri. The Euripus in its narrowest part is little more than 100 feet across. The length of the island is 115 miles, and its greatest breadth 33 miles. The surface is mountainous, but very fertile. The highest mountains are those of Delphi, which attain an elevation of 5725 feet. The principal products are corn, wine, oil, cotton, fruit, honey, pitch, and turpentine. Many cattle, sheep, and goats are reared. Mineral products are lignite and chrome-ores, black marble, magnesia, etc. The chief town is Chalcis. Together with the island of Skyros, Eubæa forms a nome of Greece. Pop. of the nome in 1896, 106,777.

Euchee, yu'chee, a post-hamlet of Meigs co., Tenn., 15 miles NW. of Sweetwater.

Euchecanna, yu'chee-an'na, a post-village of Walton co., Fla., about 115 miles W. of Tallahassee. Its banking point is Pensacola.

Euchee (or Uchee) Creek, Ala., runs E. through Russell co. and enters the Chattahoochee River.

Euclid, yû'klid, a post-village of Polk co., Minn., 14 miles by rail N. of Crookston. Pop. about 350.

Euclid, a post-village of Onondaga co., N.Y., near the Oneida River, 11 miles NNW. of Syracuse. Pop. 150.

Euclid, a banking post-village of Cayahoga co., Ohio, 10 miles ENE. of Cleveland, with which it is connected by street-railroad. It has a basket-factory and manufactures of wine. Pop. about 800.

Euclid, a post-hamlet of Butler co., Pa.

Eudokeef (yu'do-keef) or Foggy Islands, Alaska, a group of small islands in the Pacific Ocean, off the SE. coast of Alaska, a part of the group of Seven Islands.

Eudora, a post-hamlet of Jasper co., Ga., 14 miles S. of Covington. Pop. 50.

Eudora, a banking city of Douglas co., Kan., on the S. bank of the Kansas River, at the mouth of the Wakarusa River, 8 miles E. of Lawrence (on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé R.). Pop. in 1900, 640.

Eudora, a post-town of De Soto co., Miss., 9 miles W. of Hernando. Pop. in 1900, 91.

Eufaula, yu-faw'la, a banking city of Barbour co., Ala., on the W. bank of the Chattahoochee River, about 50 miles S. of Columbus, Ga., and 80 miles ESE. of Montgomery, on the Central of Georgia R. Large steamboats can ascend the river to this point at all seasons. It has cotton-mills, manufactures of carriages, cotton-seed oil, ice, bricks, etc., and is the seat of the Union Female College. It is an important shipping point for cotton. Pop. in 1890, 4394; in 1900, 4532.

Eufaula, a banking post-town of the Creek Nation, I.T., on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas R., 123 miles N. by E. of Denison. It raises cotton, etc. Pop. in 1900, 757.

Euganean (yu-gâ'ne-an) Hills, a low volcanic range of northern Italy, 9 miles SW. of Padua, extending for about 10 miles from NW. to SE. and containing many hot springs. The culminating point is the Monte Venda, 1890 feet.

Eugene, a post-village of Stanislaus co., Cal. Pop. 60.

Eugene, a post-hamlet of Miller co., Ga.

Eugene, a post-village of Vermillion co., Ind., on the Vermillion River, 18 miles SE. of Danville, Ill. Pop. about 500.

Eugene, a banking city, capital of Lane co., Oregon, on the Willamette River, at the head of steamboat navigation, and on the Southern Pacific R., 45 miles S. of Albany. It has iron-works and machine-shops, tanneries, and manufactures of wagons, furniture, leather, woollens, excelsior, sash and doors, etc. It is the seat of the University of Oregon and is partly surrounded by an amphitheatre of low mountains. Pop. in 1900, 3236.

Eugenia, yu-jee-ne'-a, a post-village of Grey co., Ontario, 5 miles N. of Flesherton, at the falls of the Beaver River. Pop. about 200.

Euharlee, yu-har'lee, a post-village of Bartow co., Ga., on the Etowah River, at the mouth of Euharlee Creek, and about 45 miles NW. of Atlanta. Pop. about 150.

Euharlee Creek, of Georgia, rises in Polk co. and enters the Etowah River in Bartow co.

Eufala, a post-village of Saluda co., S.C. The banking point is Johnston. Pop. about 150.

Eufalia, yu-lâ'-le-a, a township of Potter co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 1215.

Eulau, oi'lâw, a town of Austria-Hungary, in Bohemia, district of Tetschen. Pop. about 3000.

Eule, oi'leh, or Elsu, â'lâw, a town of Bohemia, 12 miles S. of Prague, once noted for its gold-mines. Pop. about 2000.

Eulengebirge, oi'lên-geh-been'geh (i.e., "owl mountains"), a small range of mountains in the Prussian province of Silesia, N. of the town of Glatz, forming part of the Sudetic system. The highest peak, the Hohe Eule, has an elevation of 3325 feet above the sea.

Eulia, yu'le-a, a post-hamlet of Macon co., Tenn., 8 miles (direct) WSW. of Lafayette.

Eulogy, a post-village of Bosque co., Tex., 20 miles N. of Meridian. Pop. about 90.

Eunice, a banking post-town of St. Landry parish, La., on the Southern Pacific R. Pop. in 1900, 316.

Eunola, a post-town of Geneva co., Ala. The banking point is Geneva. Pop. in 1900, 132.

Eupatoria, yu-pâ-to're-â, formerly Koslov, kos-lov', a seaport of Russia, on the western coast of the Crimea, 38 miles WNW. of Simferopol. It has numerous mosques. Pop. in 1897, 17,915, mainly Tartars and Karaite Jews.

Eupen, oi'pen (Fr. Néau, nâ'ô'), a town of Rhenish Prussia, 10 miles SSW. of Aix-la-Chapelle. It has spinning-mills and other establishments connected with the textile industry, iron-foundries, machine-shops, tanneries, etc. Pop. in 1900, 14,297.

Eupeptic Springs, a watering-place of Iredell co., N.C., 12 miles N. of Statesville.

Euphemia, yu-fee-me-a, a post-village of Preble co., Ohio, on Twin Creek, 22 miles WNW. of Dayton. Pop. about 250.

Euphrates, yu-frâ'tës (Gr. Ἐφράτης; Turk. Frat, frât), a river of Asiatic Turkey, has its sources in two principal branches in about 40° N. lat. and between 41° 30' and 42° 55' E. lon. The Murad-Su, its easternmost and largest branch, has its origin in the Armenian highlands, near the meridian last named, while a smaller branch, the Kara-Su, rises 70 or 80 miles farther W. in the same region, about 24 miles NE. of Erzerum. These main confluent unite near Keban-Maden, about lat. 38° 30' N. and lon. 38° 30' E., and thence the river takes the name of Euphrates. The general course of the two principal affluents before their union, as well as that of the main river, is SW. to within about 90 miles of the Gulf of Iskanderun. Thence it takes a general southeastern course, which it preserves till it discharges its waters into the Persian Gulf, after a course of about 1800 miles from the head-waters of the Murad-Su. The latter river of itself has a course of over 300 miles before its junction with the Kara-Su. For about 580 miles from their source the Euphrates and its upward tributaries flow through a mountainous country. At Hit, in lat.  $33^{\circ} 38' N.$  and lon.  $42^{\circ} 43' E.$ , the country begins to be level, and both above and below this town ancient irrigating aqueducts of costly construction diverge from the main stream. The Euphrates is 120 yards in width a little below the junction of its two main branches. Its general breadth varies from 200 to 400 and even 600 yards, but the river narrows (owing to the numerous canals for irrigation) below Hillah (near the site of ancient Babylon, and where we enter the almost stoneless lower plain) to 160, 120, and even 60 yards in width. It receives the Tigris in about  $31^{\circ} N.$  lat. and  $47^{\circ} 29' E.$  lon. The united stream, which takes the name of Shat-el-Arab, expands to nearly half a mile in breadth, and for the last 40 miles to even greater dimensions. The general depth of the upper Euphrates exceeds 8 feet, and between the influx of the river Khabur and the town of Basra, on the Shat-el-Arab, the depth ordinarily varies from 8 to 21 feet (although much exceeding this in places), the shallows being in the lower parts of the river, in the marshes once forming the Chaldean Lake, where the Euphrates separates into two branches, from which smaller ones and numerous irrigating cuts diverge. Below Basra the depth increases to 30 feet, and in some places to 40 feet or more. The current varies from 2 to 4 miles an hour at high-water. The Euphrates is navigable without serious interruption from Birejik to the sea, a distance of over 1100 miles, and rafts are floated down even above Birejik. There are, however, some obstructions to navigation at low-water, caused by ledges of rocks. Steamers of 500 tons ascend the Shat-el-Arab regularly to Basra, and those of the Tigris fleet to Korna (en route to Bagdad), at the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris. The quantity of water discharged by the Shat-el-Arab is computed to be about 240,000 cubic feet per second. The principal tributary of the Euphrates between the Kara-Su and the Tigris is the Khabur, entering on the E. See TIGRIS.

The flooding of the Euphrates is caused by the melting of the snow in the mountains along the upper part of the course. This takes place about the beginning of March, and increases gradually up to the end of May. The river continues high and very rapid for 30 or 40 days; but afterwards decreases daily until it reaches its lowest in September and October. The increment of land about the delta has been found to be a mile in 30 years. The region between the Euphrates and the Tigris on the E. is ancient Mesopotamia.

Eupora, yu-pó'rah, a banking post-town of Webster co., Miss., 36 miles SW. of West Point, on the Southern R. Pop. in 1900, 724.

Eurasia, a geographic term for the united continental divisions of Europe and Asia.

Eure, ur (anc. Ebwra and Autwra), a river of France, rises in the department of Orne, flows NE. through the departments of Eure-et-Loir and Eure, and joins the Seine on the left above Pont de l'Arche. Its chief affluent is the Iton, on the left. Its length is 112 miles, for 50 of which it is navigable.

Eure, a department in the NW. of France, forming part of the old province of Normandy, situated on the estuary of the Seine. Area, 2330 sq. m. The climate is mild and humid; the surface is generally flat. The chief rivers are the Seine, its affluents, the Eure, Rille, and Andelle, and the Iton, an affluent of the Eure. Wheat, oats, flax, sugar-beets, etc., are extensively cultivated; apples and pears are important crops; pasture is extensive. The manufactures include woollens, cotton, paper, etc. Capital, Evreux. Pop. in 1901, 334,781.

Eure, a post-hamlet of Gates co., N.C. Pop. 50.

Eure-et-Loir, ur á lwaz, a department in the NW. of France, forms part of the old provinces of Orléannais and Ile-de-France. Area, about 2300 sq. m. Its chief rivers are the Eure and Loir. There are many marshes in the W. The climate is mild and temperate; the soil is extremely fertile, and a great amount of cereal grain is raised. Here excellent cavalry-horses are reared, and numerous cattle, sheep, and poultry. Capital, Chartres. Pop. in 1901, 275,433.

Eureka, yu-ree'ka, a county in the north-central part of Nevada, is intersected by the Humboldt River. Area, 4111 sq. m. The surface is partly mountainous. Here are rich mines of silver and lead. Capital, Eureka. Pop. in 1890, 3275; in 1900, 1964.

Eureka, a post-village of Talladega co., Ala., on the Choccolocco Creek, 10 miles NNW. of Talladega.

Eureka, a banking city and the capital of Humboldt co., Cal., on Humboldt Bay, about 2 miles E. of the Pacific Ocean and 7 miles NE. of the entrance to the bay. It is about 215 miles (direct) NW. of Sacramento, on the Eureka and Klamath and the Eel River and Eureka Ra. It has extensive lumber-mills, a foundry and machine-shop, a brewery, tanneries, woollen-mills, etc. Steamboats run regularly to San Francisco, 240 miles distant. Eureka has a mild and equable climate. It is surrounded by mountains and forests of redwood trees, which attain an enormous size. It has a safe harbor, separated from the ocean by a very narrow tongue of land, and with a minimum depth of water of about 24 feet. Large quantities of redwood are exported from this place to San Francisco, Hawaii, Australia, etc. Pop. in 1890, 4858; in 1900, 7327.

Eureka, a post-village of San Juan co., Colo., 6 miles N. by E. of Silverton. Pop. in 1900, 39.

Eureka, a post-village of Marion co., Fla., about 75 miles S. by W. of Jacksonville. Pop. 150.

Eureka, a post-village of Dooly co., Ga., 15 miles SW. of Hawkinsville.

Eureka, a banking city of Woodford co., Ill., 30 miles E. of Peoria, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Toledo, Peoria and Western Ra. It is the seat of Eureka College, which was founded in 1855, and is a shipping point for grain and live-stock. Pop. in 1900, 1661.

Eureka, a post-village of Spencer co., Ind., 10 miles W. of Rockport. Pop. about 125.

Eureka, a post-village of Adams co., Iowa, 9 miles N. of Corning.

Eureka, a banking city, capital of Greenwood co., Kan., on the Fall River and on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Missouri Pacific Ra., 48 miles S. of Emporia. The Southern Kansas Academy is located here. It is a shipping point for grain and produce. Pop. in 1900, 2091.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Lyon co., Ky., 7 miles W. of Eddyville.

Eureka, a post-village of Kennebec co., Me. Pop. 115.

Eureka, a post-village of Clinton co., Mich., 9 miles N. of St. John. Pop. about 200.

Eureka, a post-village of St. Louis co., Mo., on the Maramee River, 30 miles WSW. of St. Louis. Pop. 150.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Hayes co., Neb.

Eureka, a banking post-village, capital of Eureka co., Nev., is 65 miles E. of Austin, on the Eureka and Palisade R. It has rich mines of gold, silver and lead, and has smelting- and refining-works. Pop. about 1000.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Sullivan co., N.Y.

Eureka, a post-town of Wayne co., N.C. The banking point is Goldsboro. Pop. in 1900, 123.

Eureka, a post-hamlet of Gallia co., Ohio.

Eureka, a post-village of Montgomery co., Pa., 23 miles N. of Philadelphia.

Eureka, a banking city of McPherson co., S.Dak., 26 miles from Roscoe, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. It is a shipping point for grain. Pop. in 1900, 901.

Eureka, a post-village of Navarro co., Tex., 13 miles E. of Corsicana.

Eureka, a banking city of Juab co., Utah, 85 miles S. of Salt Lake City, on the Oregon Short Line and the Rio Grande Western R. It has mines of copper, gold, and silver, smelting-works, and quartz-mills. Pop. in 1900, 3685.

Eureka, a post-village of Wallawalla co., Wash., 17 miles N. by W. of Wallawalla.

Eureka, a post-village of Winnebago co., Wis., on the Fox River, about 16 miles W. of Oshkosh, its banking point. Pop. about 350.

Eureka, a post-village of Pictou co., Nova Scotia, on the Intercolonial R. The banking point is Stellarton or New Glasgow.

Eureka Creek, a gold-bearing creek of the Klondike region of the Yukon district of Canada, tributary to the Indian River.

Eureka Mills, Plumas co., Cal. See JOHNSVILLE.

Eureka Mills, a post-hamlet of Charlotte co., Va.

Eureka South, a village and gold-mining camp of Nevada co., Cal., 26 miles NE. of Nevada City. Pop. about 200.

Eureka Springs, a banking city and watering-place, capital of Carroll co., Ark., on the St. Louis and Northern Arkansas R., 85 miles SW. of Springfield, Mo. It is beautifully situated among the Ozark Mountains, and has mineral-waters for which it is celebrated. Pop. in 1900, 3572.

Euripus, yu-rí'pús, the narrowest part of the channel separating Euboea from the main-land of Greece. It is at one place little more than 100 feet wide. Its remarkable tidal currents have been noticed from early times.

Euroa, a post-town of Victoria, Australia, 93 miles by rail N. by E. of Melbourne. Pop. about 1200.

Europa, a small island, claimed by France, in the Mozambique Channel. Lat.  $22^{\circ} 19' S$ .

Europe, yu'rip (Gr. Εὐρώπη, Eurōpē; L. Euro'pa), a continent or semi-continent of the eastern hemisphere, constituting the western division of the grand-division now generally recognized by geographers as Eurasia (Europe-Asia). It consists of a main-land and of a number of larger and smaller islands that constructionally or politically belong to it, as Great Britain and Ireland, Iceland, Nova Zembla, the Faroe Islands, Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, the Balearic and Grecian Islands, etc. The extreme points of the main-land are the North Cape, on the island of Magerø, on the N., in lat.  $71^{\circ} 12' N$ ; Cape Tarifa or the Punta Marroqui, in the S., lat.  $35^{\circ} 59' N$ ; the Cavo da Roca, in the W., in lon.  $9^{\circ} 30' W$ , and a point in the Ural Mountains in about lon.  $66^{\circ} 8' E$ . In its N. and S. extent the main-land traverses 35 degrees of latitude, or about 2400 miles; its N.E. and S.W. extent is very much greater. The British Isles are planted upon an oceanic platform which is covered in most parts by but an insignificant depth of water, and have until a recent geological period been united with the continental main. The separation from Africa by the Strait of Gibraltar is also a late geological occurrence, as is likewise that from Anatolia (Asia Minor) by the Dardanelles and Bosphorus. Nova Zembla is a disrupted portion of the Ural chain extending into the Arctic Ocean. The boundaries of Europe are: on the N., the Arctic Ocean; on the E., Asia, the Ural range constituting a great part of the boundary, and the Caspian Sea; on the S., Asia, the Black Sea, and the Mediterranean Sea; on the W., the Atlantic Ocean. The range of the Caucasus is commonly regarded as forming part of the boundary between Europe and Asia, but many modern geographers consider the depression of the Manytch about 3 degrees of latitude farther to the N. to be properly the limit of Europe in this quarter. Area, about 3,750,000 sq. m.

Relief and General Features of the Land.—Europe is the only one of the greater divisions of the globe which lies wholly outside of the tropics, and is therefore climatically, florally, and faunally more of a unit than either North America or Asia. Its coast-line is more irregular and broadly indented than that of any other of the continents, the large arms or bights of the outer ocean—White Sea, Baltic Sea, North Sea, British Channel, Bay of Biscay, Mediterranean (with its sub-arm, the Adriatic Sea)—permitting free ingress to points located in the interior, and virtually bringing the heart of the country into direct communication with the ocean. This condition has necessarily exerted a marked influence upon the development of the land. The length of the coast-line, as measured upon the larger and smaller sinuosities, has been estimated at from 20,000 to 50,000 miles. An elevation of the western coast by 150–600 feet would reunite the main-land with the British Isles and with the outlying Shetland group, and carry the continent to its proper oceanic contour.

Surface Relief.—Despite its high mountains Europe has a less general elevation than any of the other continents, its mean height being probably under 1000 feet. Nearly or quite one-half of the land lies at a level less than 600 ft. above the sea, while in some parts, as in the Netherlands and the region bordering upon the Caspian Sea, the surface is actually depressed below sea-level, at the mouth of the Volga to the extent of fully 80 ft. On the Netherlands coast the incursion of the sea is prevented through the construction of gigantic sea-walls or dikes, and the inner waters are carried on elevations several feet above the level of the depressed lowland. To the region of lowland belong the greater part of Russia, from the Arctic Ocean to the Black and Caspian seas, the North German plain, the central plain of Hungary, the lower Danubian plain, and the great plain of northern Italy which represents a northern arm of the Adriatic basin filled in by sediment derived from the Alps.

Mountains.—The dominant mountain-chains of Europe almost everywhere define shore-lines, or contour-depressed lowland. The most ancient are probably those of the Scandinavian peninsula, the Scandinavian Alps or Dovrefjeld, which find their continuation in the Grampians of northern Scotland, and which bear to the continent at large the same constructional relation that is borne by the Labrador and Laurentian Highlands to the continent of North America. The highest summit is the Ymes Fjeld, which attains an elevation of 8540 feet. The culminating point of this system in the British Isles, and the loftiest point in this detached portion of Europe, is Ben Nevis, 4406 feet, which stands on the southern side of the great rift, the picturesque Glen More, which, with its deep lakes (Ness, Oich, Lochy) and the Caledonian Canal, separates the N.W. from the S.E. Highlands. The most imposing of the European mountains, if we assume the Caucasus to be entirely Asiatic, are those of the great Alpine system, which constructionally or orographically are composed of the Alps proper, the Apennines, Carpathians, Balkans, and some of the southern mountains of Spain. The Alps proper, as generally recognized, begin near Savona, N.W. of Genoa, and sweep in a vast curve of 700 miles length along the frontiers of Italy and France and through Switzerland and southern Germany into Austria, terminating a short distance westward of the Austrian capital. They cover an area of approximately 80,000 sq. m. Being of comparatively recent formation, dating their final uplift from the Tertiary period, they exhibit those marked features of ruggedness and abruptness which are ordinarily absent from mountains of great age and which have given to them aspects of grandeur that are hardly to be matched elsewhere on the globe. The loftiest summit of the Alps and of all Europe (not here considering the Caucasus) is Mont Blanc, on the confines of France and Italy, 15,782 feet in height. Other summits are Monte Rosa, 15,217 ft.; the Dom, 14,942 ft.; Weiss-horn, 14,804 ft.; Matterhorn, 14,780 ft.; Finsteraarhorn, 14,025 ft.; Jungfrau, 13,670 ft., etc.

The Apennines, which constitute the Italian extension of the Alpine system, form the backbone of the Italian peninsula, whence they pass out into Sicily, and reappear in the N. of Africa as the Atlas mountains. A branch of this system is again deflected northward through Morocco into the promontory of Tangier, and beyond the Strait of Gibraltar in the Sierra Ronda or Sierra Nevada of Spain. The culminating point of the Apennines is Monte Corno of the Gran Sasso d'Italia, 9585 feet; that of the Sierra Nevada, the Cumbre de Mulhacen, 11,420 ft. The easterly continuation of the Alps is constituted by the Carpathian mountains, which define in great part the deep basin of the central Hungarian plain, sweep back as the Transylvanian Alps to the Danube, and beyond that river are continued by the main mountains of the Balkan peninsula. The highest summit is the Gerladorfer Spitze, 8737 ft., with the Lomnitzer Spitze, Schladendorfer Spitze, Meeranggen Spitze, etc., as subordinate summits. The highest summit of the Balkan chain proper has an elevation of about 7800 ft. The mountains which extend southward from the Balkan range attain an elevation of nearly 10,000 ft. (Rilo-Dagh). Another and more direct offshoot of the Alps is constituted by the mountains which define the eastern borders of the Adriatic Sea (Dinaric Alps, etc.) and are prolonged through Greece, giving to it its dominant lines of relief, into the island of Crete.

The Pyrenees, which form the boundary between Spain and southwestern France, and their western continuation, the Cantabrian mountains, seem genetically to be a part of the Alpine system, although the relation is not quite clear. The culminating point is the Pic de Néthou (Aneto), 11,165 feet. Central Spain consists largely of a vast ancient upland, the meseta, which, like parts of central and south-eastern France, southern Germany, and western Austria, constituted one of the primary bulwarks of the continent, receiving the impacts which were forced to it in the construction of the later mountains. It has only in a recent period been drained of the lacustrine waters which covered its surface as a relict of an oceanic transgression. Of the minor mountains of west-central Europe should be mentioned the Harz, Vosges, Jura, Black Forest, Thuringian Forest, Ore Mountains, Bohemian Forest, and Giant Mountains, with elevations nowhere exceeding 5700 ft. (Crêt de la Neige, Mont Reculet in the Jura), and usually falling below 4500 ft. The remaining important mountains of the semi-continent are the ancient and largely degraded Urals, on the eastern border, which attain their loftiest point in the Telpä-is, 5526 ft. The Caucasus, lying south of the Manytch depression, which are assumed by some geographers to form the true physical boundary between Russia and Asia on the S.E., and probably can be traced through the Yaila mountains of the Crimea to the eastern Balkans, contain summits loftier than the highest of the Alps; such are the volcanic peaks Elbrus (upwards of 18,000 feet) and Kasbek, and several other summits which considerably exceed Mont Blanc in elevation. For a more detailed account of the mountains of Europe see the notices of the different mountain-chains and of their individual peaks, and of the different countries in which the mountains occur.

Mountain Passes.—All the main mountain-masses of Europe are traversed by more or less serviceable road-passes, some of which attain a great altitude. Such are the pass of Roncesvalles in the western Pyrenees; the Col di Tenda, Mont Cenis (close to which is the tunnel of the Mont Cenis railroad), Little St. Bernard (7176 feet), Great St. Bernard (8110 ft.), Simplon (6590 ft., beneath which is the Simplon railway-tunnel), St. Gotthard (6935 ft., with the near-by St. Gotthard railway-tunnel, 9½ miles in length), Splügen, Bernardino, Brenner (4400 ft., traversed by railroad since 1867, and the first operated wagon-road across the main chain of the Alps), and Stelvio or Stifiser Joch, in the Alps, the last-named having on it the loftiest carriage-road of all Europe, 9055 ft.; the Tarnow and Rotherurm passes in the Carpathians; the Shipka, in the Balkans; and the Dariel, a military road, across the central Caucasus. Numerous passes, with excellent roadways, connect valleys between subordinate mountain-ridges, as the Grimsel and Furka passes in the heart of the Swiss Alps, the latter, the highest wagon-road of Switzerland, attaining an elevation of almost exactly 8000 ft. Still higher passes are those that are serviceable for pedestrians only, as the Théodule Pass uniting Switzerland with Italy, and crossing the great glacier that lies to the east of the Matterhorn at an elevation of 10,900 ft.

Glaciers.—The glaciers of Europe are confined practically to the Scandinavian Alps, the Alps proper, and the Caucasus; they are wanting in the Apennines, Carpathians, Balkans, and Urals, and are but feebly represented in the Pyrenees. The greatest continuous glacial snow-field or névé is that of the Jostedalbrå, in Norway, which covers an area of approximately 350 sq. m. One of the largest and most noted of the Norwegian glaciers is the Buar-brå. The low snow-line of Scandinavia permits many of the glaciers to reach within a short distance of the sea-level. In Switzerland the lowest level attained by them is about 4000 feet (lower Grindelwald Glacier), but usually the glaciers terminate considerably higher. The largest of the several hundred that are found here is the Aletsch, descending from the southern snows of the Jungfrau-Finsteraarhorn group of the Bernese Alps, and measuring inclusive of its névé about 13 miles in length. More famous, but considerably smaller, is the Mer de Glace of the Mont Blanc chain. (For a further statement regarding these glaciers see ALPS and SWITZERLAND.) The glaciers of the Caucasus are of almost equal magnitude with those of the Alps, but they have been less extensively investigated. One of the largest is the Devdorski Glacier. The line of perpetual snow is located in the Alps at an altitude of 8500–9500 ft.; in the Scandinavian peninsula it descends to 6000–5000, and in the further north to 3000 and 2000 ft. It nowhere reaches sea-level. Perpetual snow-fields cover the higher summits of the Sierra Nevada and Pyrenees, but only disjointed snow-tracts rest during the summer on the higher Carpathians. During the Glacial Period the whole of northern Europe, including the British Isles, the Scandinavian peninsula, the North German plain, and the greater part of Russia down to about the 50th parallel of latitude, was buried beneath streams of flowing ice, whose general trend was southward and whose origin was, in part at least, the highlands of Scandinavia. The evidences of this past, but recent, glaciation are found in extensive accumulations of drift, erratics, and scarred rock surfaces. The presence and movement of this ice appear to have exerted a most marked influence upon the distribution of the plant and animal life of the continent. Coincidentally with the development of this northern ice-sheet the mountains of the south originated vast glaciers of their own, which far surpassed in extent and massiveness the lingering glaciers of to-day. See SWITZERLAND.

Volcanoes.—The only active volcano on the continent of Europe to-day is Vesuvius, on the Bay of Naples, with a height of 4200 feet. A semi-active diminutive cone is also found in the northeastern angle of Spain, among the foothills of the Pyrenees. Extinct volcanic cones and bosses and various forms of comparatively recent igneous extrusions are found in the Eifel region of western Germany; the heart of France, particularly in the volcanic tract of Auvergne (Puy de Cantal, Puy de Sancy, Puy de Dôme, etc.); in the Euganean Hills of northern Italy; in the Hegyalys (Tokay) of northern Hungary; and in various parts of the Græco-Macedonian region, etc. They are also largely manifest in the northern and western parts of Scotland (and its adjacent islands) and the north of Ireland, where they build up two of the most famous scenic points of Europe, Fingal's Cave and the Giant's Causeway. The phases of active vulcanicity are centred mainly in the European islands, especially those of the Mediterranean basin. The more prominent cones of this region are Etna, on the eastern coast of Sicily, 10,755 ft.; Stromboli, one of the Lipari Islands, 3020 ft., which appears to have been continuously active for a period of 2000 years; and Santorin, among the Cyclades. The region of greatest destructivity is that of Iceland, on which are located upward of a hundred cones, 25 of which appear to have been in activity during the historic period. Of these, Hecla and Skaptar-Jökull have been made famous by the immensity and intensity of their discharges. As part of the volcanic phenomena of the island should be mentioned the geysers, one of which, the Geysir, has given its name to the exponents of its class of phenomena generally.

Internal Waters.—Compared with the largest streams of America, Asia, and Africa, the rivers of Europe are none of them of the first magnitude, but no continental area has its interior parts brought into such easy and direct communication with the surrounding oceanic waters as Europe. Three "heights of land" are the principal distributaries to its waters. These are the Valдай Plateau of west-central Russia, whence the Volga flows SE. to the Caspian Sea; the Dnieper to the Black Sea, and the Dūna (or Western Drīna) westward to the Baltic Sea; northwestern Austria-Hungary, which harbors the sources of the Elbe, Oder, and Vistula, and the March as one of the tributaries of the Danube; and the heart of the Alps, whence the Rhine flows northward to the North Sea, the Rhone SW. to the Mediterranean, and the Po and Adige E. and SE. to the Adriatic. The largest of the European rivers, both in length and the volume of its waters, is the Volga, which, with its tributaries, affords navigation over about 7000 miles. The Danube, with a length of about 1800 miles, is the second stream of the continent. It rises on the eastern face of the Black Forest (its chief tributaries are Alpine streams) and is the only major stream of Europe that takes a dominantly eastern course. The most important river of central and western Europe is the Rhine. (See RHINE, DANUBE, VOLGA, etc.) Other well-known waters of the continent are the Ural, Drīna, Petchora, Don, Dniester, the two Bugs, Niemen, and Neva (on the banks of which is situated St. Petersburg) in Russia; the Warthe, Weeser, Ems, and Main in Germany; the Inn, Theiss, Save, and Drave (all tributaries of the Danube); the Meuse and Scheldt of France, Belgium, and the Netherlands; the Seine, Loire, Saône, Dordogne, and Garonne in France; the Tiber in Italy; and the Ebro, Douro, Tagus, Guadiana, and Guadalquivir of the Iberian peninsula. The commercially important Thames, on which is located the most populous city of the world, has a length of only a little more than 200 miles.

A number of important canal connections between the main streams unite the opposing seas of the continent and establish direct water-ways of inestimable value in the development of commercial relations. Thus, the Volga system of waters is united with the Drīna and the Neva (joining the Caspian Sea with the Baltic and the Arctic Ocean), the Dnieper with the Dūna and the Vistula (joining the Black and Baltic seas), the Danube with the Rhine, by means of the Ludwig's Canal (joining the Black and North seas), and the Rhone with the Rhine, the Seine, and the Loire (uniting the Mediterranean with the North Sea, the English Channel, and the main Atlantic). A canal traversing Holstein unites the North and Baltic seas.

Lakes.—The largest of the enclosed bodies of water of Europe after the Black Sea (which is a part of the ancient Mediterranean basin) and the Caspian, a relict of an Aralo-Caspian-Arctic Sea, is Lake Ladoga, in Russia, just north of the 60th parallel of latitude, which covers an area about equal to that of Lake Ontario, or more than 30 times the area of the Swiss lakes. Next in size is the neighboring Onega Lake. The greater number of the European lakes lie within the region of comparatively recent glaciation, and there is reason to believe that many of them, including those occupying deep rock basins, have been formed through the excavating power of moving ice. The regions of northwestern Russia, Finland, and Sweden (Vener, Vetter, and Mälar lakes), and of the Alps are pre-eminently marked by glacial scour; and equally so, the lowland and highland region of the greater part of the British Isles. The largest and better known of the Alpine lakes, all of them famed for the beauty of their scenery, are Geneva, Lucerne, Constance, Neuchâtel, Zürich, Zug, Thun, Brienz, the Königssee, Chiem, and Hallstadt. The subalpine lakes of northern Italy, hardly less beautiful than those of the north,—Maggiore, Lugano, Como, Garda, Iseo,—are seemingly in part of fjord formation, representing parts of a former extension of the Mediterranean waters. A number of lakes of central and southern Italy, such as Bolsena, Bracciano, Nemi, Albano, Lucrino, and Fusaro, occupy, or have been thought to occupy, crateral hollows. Other noted European lakes are Balaton, of the Hungarian plain; Killarney, in Ireland; Windermere, in northern England; and Lomond and numerous lakelets of the Scottish Highlands. See the names of the individual lakes and the articles BLACK SEA and CASPIAN SEA.

Climate.—Europe enjoys the most temperate climate of any of the great divisions of the globe, a condition due to its latitudinal position and the deep penetration of its entering waters. Five broad climatic provinces may be recognized: 1, the Mediterranean, which is largely shut off from the cold winds of the north and receives an increment of heat from the north of Africa; 2, the oceanic or west European,—the region between France and southern Norway; 3, the Baltic; 4, the subarctic, dominating the region north of the Arctic Circle and characterised in most parts by winters of extreme severity; and 5, the Pontine or east-central, which is largely that of west-central Asia. The highest annual temperature of all Europe is seemingly found at Malta, 66° F., being about 5° warmer than at Constantinople and 4° higher than at Gibraltar. At Archangel, in lat. 63° 33' N., where the January temperature is about -7°, the temperature for the year is approximately that of freezing. This town has nearly the lowest yearly temperature in Europe, although the winter cold is fully equalled at Kazan, about 600 miles farther to the south, and nearly so at Moscow. London and Paris enjoy almost identical climatic temperatures, measured by the mean for the coldest (January, 35°-38°) and warmest (July, 64°-66°) months, and by the average for the year (50°). The extremes are, however, much greater at Paris, where the temperatures of 104° and -23° have been recorded. The average annual temperature of some of the more important cities is as follows: Stockholm, 41½°; St. Petersburg, 38½°; Edinburgh, 47°; Warsaw, 45°; Vienna, 50°; Geneva, 49°; Barcelona, 65°; Rome, 60°; and Athens, 63°.

The quantity of rainfall is very variable, being largest on the oceanic and Mediterranean borders. Over a large part of the interior the annual precipitation is less than 25 inches. In Castile and Aragon the fall is reduced to 14-19 inches, and at Dunkirk, in France, it is only 12 inches. Frankfurt-on-the-Main has 19 inches and London, despite its very large number of rainy days, only 22 inches. On the western edge of the Scottish Highlands the rainfall rises to 80 inches or more, an amount nearly equalling that (83 inches) found at Bergen, Norway. At Tolmesso, in Italy, a fall of 90 inches is annually recorded. In Lisbon the December precipitation is about 27 times that of July; in Naples the precipitation is 11 times greater in November than in July; and in Rome 10 times greater in October than in July. In Palermo, Sicily, it is claimed that not a single drop of rain fell during the month of July in the period of 47 years between 1806 and 1853.

Vegetation.—Three broad floral zones can be recognized for the continent of Europe: 1, the Mediterranean, which has a strong affiliation with the floral zone of northern Africa, in which trees with fleshy evergreen leaves largely replace those of the ordinary deciduous type and where some of the most distinctive vegetable forms, whether indigenous or introduced and cultivated, are constituted by the myrtle, laurel, oleander, chestnut, cork-oak, pignon (or stone-pine), palmetto, date, orange, citron, olive, nopal, and agave; 2, the central European or Germanic, where the components of the native forest are the ordinary deciduous trees, such as the oak, beech, birch, poplar, elm, maple, and willow, interspersed or alternating in belts with the pine, fir, spruce, and larch among evergreens; in this zone, which on the Atlantic coast extends to about the centre of Norway, the cereals are extensively cultivated (barley to beyond the 70th parallel of latitude); and 3, the subarctic and Arctic zone, which in Russia carries far southward its sombre forests of evergreens and in the north includes the grass and moss tundras of the half-frozen soil. Other distinctive vegetal regions are the heaths of northern Germany and the steppes of southeastern Russia, which in their treeless character and wealth of grasses and flowers recall the American prairies.

Animal Life.—The fauna of Europe is intimately linked with the temperate faunas of both Asia and North America, and forms part of the Holarctic division of zoogeographers. Many of its forms, as the polar bear, elk (or moose), reindeer, wolf, fox, Arctic hare, beaver, and other rodents, are also found on the American continent, and others are replaced by representative and closely related species. There is no question at this time that a land bridge via Spitzbergen or Iceland and Greenland, within a comparatively recent geological period (Middle Tertiary and later), united the two continents and permitted of the transference from one to the other of their faunal parts. Of some of the more distinctive animal types of Europe may be mentioned the European bison, which is now restricted to the Caucasus and the forest preserves of Lithuania; the chamois and ibex of the higher elevations of the Pyrenees, Alps, and Carpathians; the musimon, or mouflon (big horn), of Corsica and Sardinia; the sigma antelope of the steppes of southeast Russia; the axis deer of the Mediterranean region; the roebuck and stag; and the Alpine and Russian marmots. The jackal is still found in parts of Greece and the Balkan peninsula, and it seems not unlikely that the lion may also have been until recently an inhabitant of Macedonia. The tiger occasionally visits the region of the Caspian Sea. A single species of monkey, the Barbary ape, inhabits the rock of Gibraltar, whither it may have been introduced. A number of the south European quadrupeds are also found in the north of Africa, and there can be no question that direct interchanges between the two regions were formerly effected along the lines of Gibraltar and Sicily at a time, following or coincident with the Glacial Period, when the Mediterranean basin had not yet been fully formed. Fossil elephants have been found in Malta, and the cavern and other deposits of Spain, Italy, Greece, France, England, etc., have brought to light an exceedingly rich fauna made up largely of forms that are to-day considered to be of African (and partially Asiatic) types, such as the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, lion, hyena, jackal, etc. There is no doubt that much of the European fauna is of Asiatic origin. Among the European birds may be numerated a large number of species of sparrows, warblers and flycatchers, the nightingale, skylark, bullfinch and bee-eater, the kimmergerier (or bearded vulture) of the Alps, the African vulture, and the bastard of the Russian plains. Europe has only one poisonous serpent, the common adder or viper. There is no large saurian, but lizards of small size are plentiful, more particularly in the Mediterranean region.

Mineral Resources.—The mineral resources of Europe are very extensive, and include gold (extensively mined in the Ural mountains and the Carpathians), silver, platinum (found in the Ural tract alone), tin (principally from Cornwall, England), zinc, lead, copper, mercury (principally mined at Almadén, in Spain, and Idria, in Carniola), iron, rock-salt (the most extensive deposits at Wieliczka and Bochnia, in Galicia and Máramaros, in Hungary), and coal, the largest deposits of the last-named being found in England, the east of France, Belgium, Germany, and south Russia. Iron is very extensively distributed, the best quality coming from Sweden. Mineral springs are numerous, among the best known being those of Vichy, Wiesbaden, Ems, Baden-Baden, Kissingen, Homburg, Schwalbach, Nauheim, Selters, Spa, Karlsbad, Marienbad, Franzensbad, Gastein, Hall, Reichenhall, Teplitz, Buda (Hunyadi), and Epsom.

The states of Europe in the order of their area are (the various states of the German Empire not being individually enumerated): Russia, Austria-Hungary, the German Empire, France, Spain, Sweden, Norway (declared independent in 1905), Great Britain, Italy, Turkey, Rumania, Bulgaria, Portugal, Greece, Servia, Switzerland, Denmark (without Iceland), Belgium, Netherlands, Montenegro, Luxemburg, Andorra, Liechtenstein, San Marino, Monaco. Russia embraces more than half of the total area of Europe. Nearly 8 per cent. belongs to the Scandinavian Peninsula; 7 per cent. is included in Austria-Hungary; Germany, France, and Spain have each a little more than 6 per cent.; Great Britain and Italy, about 3 per cent. each. The smallest state, Monaco, has 8 sq. m. The population of Europe slightly exceeds 400,000,000. Of this figure about one-fourth belongs to Russia; one-seventh to the German Empire; one-eighth to Austria-Hungary; one-tenth to the British Isles; nearly one-tenth to France; one-twelfth to Italy; and a little more than one-twenty-fifth to Spain.

Ethnography and Language.—Most of the nations of Europe belong linguistically, if not by pure descent, to the great Indo-European or Aryan stock, of which the principal European branches (as commonly recognized) are the Celtic, Teutonic, Slavic, and Græco-Latin; but in the N., E., SE., and centre of Europe are peoples belonging to the Uralo-Altaic stock, the chief among them being the Magyars (Hungarians) Finns, and Turks. The Semitic stock is represented by the Jews. In northern Spain and southern France are found the Basques, whose affinities have not been established.

The Celts once possessed the W. of Europe, from the Alps to the British Islands. The only remnant of the western Celtic language, at the present day, is the Gaelic, or Erse, spoken in some districts of Ireland, the Scotch Highlands, the Isle of Man, and the Hebrides. The Cymric Celts are represented by the Welsh and Bretons, who still use their ancient speech. To the Teutonic race belong the Germans, Scandinavians, Dutch, Frisians, Flemings, and English. To the E., in general, of the Teutonic race, though sometimes mixed with it, come the Slavic peoples, to whom belong the Russians, Poles, Czechs (Bohemians), Servians, Croatians, Slovaks, Slovenes, Bulgarians, and Montenegrins. In the S. of Europe are the descendants of the peoples who anciently spoke Greek and Latin. The Latin races include the French, Italians, Spaniards, and Portuguese. The Rumanians (Wallachs) speak a Romanic tongue. The Albanians are now considered to be sprung from the Indo-European stem. The gypsies are seemingly of East-Indian origin. The Lithuanians and Letts are allied to the Slavic races. The Finnish race includes the Finns proper, to whom are allied in language, if not in descent, the Lapps; also the Karelians, Samoyeds, Esthonians, and many other tribes. The Magyars speak a language closely allied to the Finnish. In many portions of Europe the people are of mixed race. In parts of Germany the peasantry are Slavic in blood but German in language, and in large tracts of Russia the people are Finns Russified in language and religion.

Eurotas, now called Iri, ee'ree, a river of Greece, in the Morea, the principal stream of ancient Laconia, on whose banks stood Sparta. It falls into the Gulf of Laconia. Length, 60 miles.

Eurym'edon, in ancient geography, a river of Pamphylia, Asia Minor, emptying into the Mediterranean Sea. At its mouth the Athenian commander Cimon signally defeated the Persians in 466 B.C. Its modern name is Köprü-Su.

Eurytania, Gr. pron. év-re-tá-nee', a nome in the N. of Greece. Its capital is Karpentzi, near Mount Velukhi.

Euskirchen, ois'kēēn', a town of Rhenish Prussia, 20 miles SW. of Cologne. It has important manufactures, the principal being those of woollens. Pop. in 1900, 10,285.

Eustace, a post-village of Henderson co., Tex.

Eustis, a banking post-town of Lake co., Fla., on the Plant System, 150 miles S. of Jacksonville. Pop. in 1900, 411.

Eustis, a post-township (town) of Franklin co., Me., on the Dead River, 45 miles NW. of North Anson. Pop. in 1900, 172.

Eustis, a banking post-village of Frontier co., Neb., 39 miles by rail NW. of Holdrege. Pop. in 1900, 232.

Eustis, a post-village of Sherbrooke co., Quebec. The banking point is Sherbrooke. Pop. about 300.

Eutaw, yu'taw, a banking post-town, capital of Greene co., Ala., 35 miles by rail SW. of Tuscaloosa. Pop. in 1900, 884.

Eutaw Springs, a small affluent of the Santee River, in South Carolina. Near it, in Charleston co., 60 miles NW. of Charleston, was fought a bloody battle on Sept. 8, 1781, between the Americans under Greene and the British under Stuart.

Eutawville, a post-town of Berkeley co., S.C., on the Atlantic Coast Line. The banking point is Charleston. Pop. in 1900, 305. It has lumber interests.

Eutin, oi-teen', a town of Germany, in Oldenburg, capital of the principality of Lübeck, in a detached territory enclosed by Holstein, 18 miles N. of Lübeck. It has a fine grand-ducal palace on an island in an adjacent lake, and other interesting buildings, including the mediæval church of St. Michael. Among the public monuments are one to the composer Weber, who was born here, and a bust of the poet Voss, who resided in Eutin. The town has a gymnasium, dating from the sixteenth century, and a library of 30,000 volumes. Pop. in 1900, 5204.

Euxine Sea. See BLACK SEA.

Eva, a post-hamlet of Perquimans co., N.C.

Eva, a post-hamlet of Benton co., Tenn.

Evadale, a post-village of Mississippi co., Ark., on the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis R. The banking point is Osceola. Pop. 150.

Evans, a post-village of Brown co., Minn., on the Chicago and Northwestern R. The banking point is Sleepy-eye. Pop. about 200.

Evangelist Island, the name given by Columbus to the Isle of Pines, Cuba.

Evangelist Islands, or Four Evangelists, a group of rocky islets of South America, off the W. coast of Chile, in lat. (southernmost) 52° 24' S., lon. 75° 2' W., consisting of four principal islets and some detached rocks and breakers. They form a leading-mark for the W. entrance of the Strait of Magellan.

Evans, a post-village of Hale co., Ala. The banking point is Greensboro. Pop. 100.

Evans, a post-town of Weld co., Colo., on the South Fork of the Platte River, 4 miles S. of Greeley, on the Union Pacific R. Pop. in 1900, 389.

Evans, a post-village of Marshall co., Ill., on the Chicago and Alton R., 15 miles W. of Streator.

Evans, a post-village of Mahaska co., Iowa, on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R., 5 miles W. of Oskaloosa. It has coaling interests. Pop. 1000.

Evans, or Evans Center, a post-village of Erie co., N.Y., in Evans township (town), 20 miles SSW. of Buffalo and 1½ miles from Lake Erie. Pop. 400; of the town in 1900, 2795. The town includes Angola.

Evans, a post-village of Jackson co., W.Va., on the Ohio River R. The banking point is Ripley.

Evansburg, a post-village of Coshocton co., Ohio, 30 miles NE. of Zanesville. Pop. 50.

Evansburg, Montgomery co., Pa., ¼ mile from Collegeville.

Evans City, a banking post-borough of Butler co., Pa., 14 miles SW. of Butler, on the Pittsburgh and Western and the Baltimore and Ohio R. Pop. in 1900, 1205.

Evans Falls, a post-village of Wyoming co., Pa. Pop. about 70.

Evans Landing, a post-hamlet of Harrison co., Ind., on the Ohio River, 3 miles from West Point, Ky.

Evans Mills, a post-village of Jefferson co., N.Y., on Pleasant Creek, 11 miles NE. of Watertown. Pop. about 500.

Evans, Mount, Colo., a peak of the Rocky Mountains, about 10 miles S. of Georgetown, in lat. 39° 35' N. It has an altitude of 14,330 feet above sea-level.

Evansport, a post-village of Defiance co., Ohio, on Bean Creek, 11 miles N. of Defiance. Pop. about 300.

Evansston, a city of Cook co., Ill., on Lake Michigan, 12 miles N. of Chicago. Lat. of Dearborn Observatory, 42° 3' 33" N.; lon. 87° 40' 36" W. It is on the Chicago and Northwestern and other railroads, and contains the Garrett Biblical Institute, Winchell Academy, Convent of Visitation, etc. It is also the seat of the Northwestern University (Methodist), which was founded in 1854 and is partly in Chicago. It has facilities in arts, medicine, law, dentistry, theology, etc., and had in 1901 2246 students (men and women). (See CHICAGO.) Pop. in 1900, 19,259.

Evansston, a post-village of Spencer co., Ind., on the Southern R. The banking point is Rockport. Pop. about 200.

Evansston, a banking city, capital of Uinta co., Wyo., on the Bear River and on the Union Pacific R., 75 miles NE. of Salt Lake City. Elevation, 6870 feet. It contains railroad machine-shops and has important iron- and coal-mines in the vicinity. The Wyoming Insane Asylum is located here. Pop. in 1900, 2110.

Evansville, a post-village of Washington co., Ark., about 33 miles N. of Fort Smith. Pop. 250.

Evansville, a post-hamlet of Troup co., Ga. Pop. 50.

Evansville, a banking post-town of Randolph co., Ill., on the Kaskaskia River and on the Illinois Southern R., 32 miles S. of Belleville. Pop. in 1900, 663.

Evansville, a city of Indiana, the capital of Vanderburg co., and the second city in population in the state, is situated on a broad, high plateau, which here forms the northern bank of the Ohio River, 163 miles by rail E. by S. of St. Louis. It is on the Evansville and Terre Haute, the Evansville and Indianapolis and other railroads, some of which connect by bridge across the Ohio with the Louisville and Nashville and the Ohio Valley lines. The city contains a number of prominent buildings, among which are the handsome court-house, city-hall, United States marine hospital, the Southern Indiana Hospital for the Insane, St. Joseph's Academy, Willard Library and Art Gallery, etc. Its prosperity is chiefly derived from trade and extensive manufactures of furniture, machinery, stoves and heaters, flour, saddlery and harness, lumber, tobacco, farming-implements, etc. There are extensive flouring-mills, breweries, iron-foundries, machine-shops, woollen- and cotton-mills, planing- and saw-mills, etc. Evansville is favorably situated for manufactures, being in a coal region. It is an important shipping point for corn, wheat, coal, and pork, and is the centre of a great tobacco-producing section. Pop. in 1860, 11,484; in 1870, 21,830; in 1880, 29,230; in 1890, 50,756; in 1900, 59,007.

Evansville, a banking post-village of Douglas co., Minn., 18 miles NW. of Alexandria, on the Great Northern R. Pop. in 1900, 483.

Evansville, a post-village of Tunica co., Miss. Pop. 80.

Evansville, a post-village of Monroe co., Mo., 8 miles E. of Moberly.

Evansville, a post-village of Columbia co., Pa., 4 miles N. of Berwick.

Evansville, a post-village of Rhea co., Tenn.

Evansville, a post-hamlet of Orleans co., Vt., 4 miles E. of Barton Landing.

Evansville, a post-village of Preston co., W.Va., about 70 miles SE. of Wheeling.

Evansville, a banking city of Rock co., Wis., on the Chicago and Northwestern R., 23 miles S. by E. of Madison. It has manufactures of carriages, windmills, tobacco, cheese, etc. The Evansville Seminary is located here. Pop. in 1900, 1864.

Ev'ant', a post-village of Coryell co., Tex., 22 miles (direct) W. by N. of Gatesville. Pop. about 200.

Evanton, iv'an-ton, a village of Scotland, co. of Ross, 13 miles NNW. of Inverness.

Ev'art, a banking post-village of Osceola co., Mich., on the Muskegon River and on the Pere Marquette R., 76 miles WNW. of East Saginaw. It has machine-shops, lumber-tool and carriage-factories, saw-mills, etc. Pop. in 1900, 1360.

Evarts, a post-village of Walworth co., S. Dak., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. The banking point is Bangor. Pop. about 125.

Évaux, à'vô', a town of France, in Creuse, 21 miles NE. of Aubusson. Pop. in 1901, 1848; of the commune, 3040.

Eve, a post-village of Vernon co., Mo. Pop. about 75.

Eveland, a post-village of Mahaska co., Iowa, 10 miles WSW. of Okaloosa.

Eveleth, a banking post-village of St. Louis co., Minn., on the Duluth, Missabe and Northern and the Duluth and Iron Range Rs., 71 miles NNW. of Duluth. Vast quantities of iron-ore are mined here. Pop. in 1900, 2752.

Eveline, a post-township of Charlevoix co., Mich., on an arm of Lake Michigan. Pop. in 1900, 847.

Evelyn, a post-village of Glynn co., Ga. Pop. 100.

Evendale, a post-village of Juniata co., Pa., about 24 miles SW. of Sunbury.

Evening Shade, a banking post-village and capital of Sharp co., Ark., near Strawberry Creek, 22 miles (direct) N. of Batesville. Pop. about 400.

Falaise, fá-lás' (L. Faleisia?), a town of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Calvados (Normandy), on the Ante, an affluent of the Dives, 23 miles SSE. of Caen. It is very picturesquely situated on and between rocky precipices (falaise), whence its name, and consists of three distinct parts,—the town proper, almost completely surrounded by old walls; the suburbs of Saint Laurent and Val d'Ante, extending into the narrow ravine below the precipice on which the town stands; and the suburb of Guibray, sometimes called the high town, situated on a height, where a much-frequented horse-fair, instituted in the eleventh century, is still held annually. Falaise is irregularly built and bears interesting memorials of its Norman origin,—walls and towers, the fine Norman churches of St. Gervais and St. Guibray, and the grand castle in which William the Conqueror was born. This picturesque stronghold occupies a commanding position on a rugged promontory. Its remains embrace the outer sauvages with its towers, a massive dorjon or keep, and a tower 130 feet in height. Not far from it stands a colossal bronze equestrian statue of William the Conqueror, by Rochet. The trade of the town consists mainly in horses and cattle, and the manufactures include cotton-spinning and weaving. Falaise played a prominent part in the wars between France and England and in the Huguenot wars. Pop. in 1901, 7457.

Falkland Islands (Fr. Malouines, mál'loo-éens'; Sp. Malvinas, mál-vee'nás), an island group in the South Atlantic Ocean, forming a crown colony of Great Britain, consisting altogether of some 200 islands, 250 miles NE. of Tierra del Fuego, between lat. 51° and 53° S. Only two of these islands are of any considerable size; they are called, respectively, East and West Falkland, and are separated from each other by Falkland Sound, which is from 1½ to 18 miles broad. East Falkland is about 65 miles in length and about 53 miles in breadth. West Falkland is 80 miles long by about 40 miles broad. Choiseul and Grantham sounds penetrate so deeply into either side of East Falkland as nearly to divide it into two parts. The total area is variously estimated at from 5000 to 6500 sq. m., exclusive of the dependency of South Georgia. Pop. in 1901, 2043.

On the N. part of East Falkland the hills attain a considerable elevation, but the whole of the S. portion is low, consisting of moorland and black bog, intersected by innumerable streams and pools. The soil is generally peat, but it supports in various parts shrubby bushes and a coarse grass, which afford ample nourishment to cattle. Trees are wholly wanting. Mount Adam, on West Falkland, attains an elevation of about 2300 feet. The climate is equable and healthful. The ordinary range of the thermometer is between 30° and 50° in winter, and from 40° to 65° in summer, with a mean annual temperature of 42°. Rain (yearly fall about 30 inches) and high winds are frequent. The tussock-grass is the most useful plant in the flora of these islands. It covers all the small islands of the group like a forest of miniature palms, growing to 5 or 6 feet in height, and thrives best on the shores exposed to the spray of the sea. Most of the useful kinds of vegetables and green crops can be advantageously cultivated, but fruits and wheat do not ripen.

The rearing of cattle and sheep is the principal industry, and hides, tallow, and wool are the staple exports. The native mammalian fauna comprises a fox, closely related to a Patagonian species, and a mouse; the other forms have been introduced. The wild horses of the islands, of which there are thousands, are highly thought of. Pigs and rabbits are plentiful. The numerous creeks abound in fish. Sea-elephants and seal frequent the shores, and whales resort to the surrounding waters, though now in greatly diminished numbers. There are no reptiles of any kind in the islands. The principal birds are geese, snipes, ducks, hawks, vultures, albatrosses, gulls, petrels, penguins, etc., and a very few land-birds. The people are of British and Spanish-American descent, for these islands were uninhabited when discovered.

The Falkland Islands were discovered by Davis on Aug. 14, 1592. In 1710 a French vessel from Saint-Malo touched at them and named them Isles Malouines. Settlements were afterwards formed on them by the French, English, and Spaniards, successively, but the English ultimately took possession of them in 1833. The colony has a governor, bishop, and other officers, appointed by the crown. There are government and other schools, and education is compulsory. Capital, Stanley, with a population in 1901 of 916. The Falkland Islands are in regular steamship communication with Great Britain.

Fernandez de Taos. See Taos.

Fernandina, fêr-nân-dee'nâ, a city, port of entry, and capital of Nassau co., Fla., on Amelia Island (which is in the Atlantic Ocean), 33 miles NNE. of Jacksonville, on the Florida Central and Peninsular R. It has a large export-trade in naval-stores, cotton, lumber, and phosphates, and various manufactures. Near by is Amelia Beach, a fine expanse for bathing and driving; and it is a popular place of resort in summer and winter. Lines of steamships connect it with New York and other ports. Fernandina was settled in 1632. Pop. in 1890, 2803; in 1900, 3245.

Fernando, a post-village of Los Angeles co., Cal., on the Southern Pacific R. The banking point is Los Angeles. It has fruit-growing interests. Pop. about 700.

Fernando de Noronha, fêr-nân'do dâ no-rôn'yâ, a volcanic island in the South Atlantic Ocean, 125 miles from the E. extremity of Brazil, to which it belongs. Lat. of peak (Pico, about 1090 feet in elevation), 3° 50' S.; lon. 32° 25' W. Length, from NE. to SW., 8 miles. The surface is mountainous and rugged, but fertile, and in parts cultivated. It has several harbors defended by forts, and serves as a place of banishment from Brazil. Remedios, the convict settlement, has about 2000 inhabitants.

Fernando Po, Sp. Fernando Póo (so called from the name of its discoverer, Fernão do Po), an island belonging to Spain, in the Bight of Biafra, western Africa, 20 miles from the main-land, between lat. 3° 12' and 3° 41' N. and lon. 8° 26' and 8° 57' E. It is of volcanic origin, 35 miles long and 22 miles broad. The shallow water, of less than 300 feet depth, which separates it from the continent, indicates that the island was until recently a part of the main-land, joined to the volcanic group of the Kameruns. Clarence Peak, a magnificent extinct or quiescent cone, rises to 10,190 feet. The whole island is picturesque in the extreme, being covered in the N. part with dense forests and luxuriant vegetation, while on the S. some fine park-scenery compensates for a comparative deficiency of trees. The sugar-cane grows in profusion; yams of an unusually good quality are grown in great quantities, and coffee, cotton, tobacco, rice, and bananas, together with some cinchona, are also cultivated. India-rubber and palm oil are exported. The climate is markedly unhealthy, although the temperature is not particularly high. The rainfall is 100-125 inches. There are several harbors in the island, the most spacious of which is Maidstone Bay, at the N. end, where is situated Clarence Town (Santa Isabel), originally an English settlement, established in 1827. The natives are a peculiar race, the Bubi, different in their physical characteristics and language from their neighbors on the continent. The island was discovered in 1471 (1486?) by the Portuguese, who in 1778 ceded it to Spain. Pop. in 1903, 19,542, of whom 501 were whites.

Ferrara, fēr-nā'rā (L. Forum Alerici), a city of Italy, in Emilia, capital of the province of the same name, 26 miles NNE. of Bologna and 34 miles S. of the Po. It is a large and well-built town, with spacious and regular streets. In the middle of the city is a castle, the Castello (now used as a city-bureau), which was once the residence of the dukes. Ferrara has long been falling into decay, and has hardly more than mouldering palaces to show as reminders of its golden period. It still contains a vast cathedral, dating from the early part of the twelfth century, and numerous churches, most of which contain valuable paintings, together with some interesting specimens of sculpture. It has also a public gallery of paintings, called the Palazzo de'Diamanti, containing many excellent works by the painters of the Ferrara school, a university with a limited number of students, and a public library of 100,000 volumes and 1700 MSS., the latter including some of those of Ariosto and Tasso. The house in which Ariosto lived during his latter years is now national property and is ranked among the national monuments. Another object of interest is the cell in the Hospital of St. Anna in which Tasso was imprisoned. Ferrara is an archbishop's see. It carries on some trade in grain, fruit, cattle, and wine, and has manufactures of silk, hemp, soap, wax, candles, brassen utensils, stoves, glass, etc. Under the famous house of Este the city was the capital of a sovereign duchy, and possessed one of the most polished courts in Italy and a population estimated at more than 100,000. In 1598 it passed into the possession of the popes. In the fifteenth century it was famous for its school of painting, which ranked as one of the first in Italy; and in the sixteenth century it was the asylum of Calvin, Marot, and others. A celebrated council was held at Ferrara in 1438. Pop. in 1881, 28,814; in 1901, 33,153 (commune, 87,648).

Ferrara, a province of Italy, in Emilia, bounded N. by the Po and E. by the Adriatic Sea. Area, 1010 sq. m. It is almost entirely composed of a delta formed by branches of the Po and by the Panaro and Primaro, and includes within it the extensive lagoons of Comacchio. It comprises the greater part of what was formerly the duchy of Ferrara. Capital, Ferrara. Pop. in 1901, 271,467.

Ferro (Sp. Hierro, yēr'ro; Fr. Île de Fer, eel deh fain), a rocky and partially-wooded volcanic island, the southwesternmost of the Canary Islands. Lat. of NW. point, 27° 45' 8" N.; lon. 18° 7' 5" W. of Greenwich. It is known chiefly as the place whence longitude was until recently reckoned by many geographers of continental Europe, its meridian having been taken as the line dividing the Eastern and Western hemispheres; but the conventional meridian of Ferro (17° 39' 45" W. of Greenwich or 20° W. of Paris) is not its true one. Area, 106 sq. m. Pop. in 1897, 6184. It produces good wine and fruits, archil, honey, small sheep, etc., which, with brandy, are exported. Highest point, 4550 feet. Chief town, Valverde.

Ferro, Cape, or Ras-Hadid, ris hādeed', on the N. coast of Algeria, being the E. point of Storah Bay. Lat. 37° 5' N.; lon. 7° 10' E.

Ferrol, El, el fēr-rāl', a seaport and the chief naval arsenal of Spain, province and 12 miles NE. of Corunna, on the N. arm of the Bay of Betancos. The newly strengthened fortifications on the land side, and the narrow entrance to the harbor, defended by forts Palma and San Felipe, render it almost impregnable. Ferrol is regularly laid out and contains a fine parish church and a naval academy. The town has manufactures of sail-cloth, leather, and linen, and is engaged in the sardine-fishery. Pop. in 1900, 25,281.

Fez, fês (Arab. Fas, fâs; L. Fes'ca or Fes'sa), the most populous and commercially the most important city of Morocco, and one of its capitals, in lat. 34° 6' N., lon. 5° 1' W., 100 miles E. of the Atlantic Ocean and 245 miles NE. of the city of Morocco. It is finely situated on the slope of several hills, whose acclivities are covered with orange-groves, orchards, and gardens. It is surrounded by walls and is in two nearly distinct parts, Old Fes in the W. and New Fes in a valley to the E. The streets are narrow and dirty. The city contains about 150 mosques, the principal of which are El-Karqin and the mosque of Sultan Muley Edris, the founder of Fes, which is the most sacred sanctuary in all the country. The only other notable building to be seen at Fes is the sultan's palace, an immense structure, composed of a great number of court-yards. The city is well supplied with water from the river Fes. Fes contains several hospitals and numerous caravansaries or public inns. The manufactures consist of woollen cloaks, sashes, silk handkerchiefs, slippers, red caps,—extensively used throughout the north of Africa and, from the place of manufacture, named fes,—coarse linen, fine carpets and rugs, common earthenware, saddlery and other leather-ware (the morocco of commerce), and copper utensils. The city carries on a fairly active caravan trade, which extends to Timbuktú. In the last three centuries of the Middle Ages and during the first half of the sixteenth century Fes was the capital of an independent state. It became famous as a seat of Arabic learning, resorted to from all the Mohammedan states of Africa and Spain. Its population at the time of its greatest prosperity is said to have numbered several hundred thousand. The remains of its institutions still attract round them a number of Mohammedan doctors and many scholars. Fes is considered a holy town by the western Arabs and is a place of pilgrimage. The population is variously estimated at from 90,000 to 140,000, composed chiefly of Moors, Arabs, and Berbers, with about 10,000 Jews.

Fezarah, or Fetzara, a lake of Algeria, 30 miles SSW. of Bona. It is about 30 miles long and 24 broad, and abounds in wild fowl.

Fezzan, fës'sân' (anc. Phasania or Phasania), a country of northern Africa, forming part of the Turkish regency of Tripoli, usually considered as lying between lat. 24° and 31° N. and lon. 11° and 18° E., and as being about 460 miles in length and 300 miles in breadth. It is bounded by Tripoli (adjoining the stony plateau Hammada el-Homra) on the N. (the Jebel es-Soda or Black Mountain dividing the two countries) and on all other sides by the Sahara, or Great Desert. In the N. part there are barren ranges of mountains, rising into peaks from 1200 to 1500 feet in height. To the S. of these ranges the country consists of extensive sandy plains, almost destitute of vegetation. Dates form the chief food of the inhabitants; small quantities of maize and barley are also grown. Figs, water-melons, pomegranates, lemons, and legumes are plentiful, as are also pot-herbs and garden-vegetables. Water is almost entirely wanting, although found in abundance at depths beneath the surface of from 10 to 20 feet. Most of the fertile tracts lie along the wadis, or former water-courses. In summer the heat is extreme (the highest known shade temperature of the globe being, perhaps, that of Murzuk, 135°), but in winter the cold is fairly severe. Rain seldom falls; in some districts it does not rain for years together. The wild animals are the lion, panther, hyena, jackal, antelope, and fox. A moderate trade is still carried on by caravans with Timbuktú and Bornu; while Murzuk, the capital, is the rendezvous of caravans coming from Cairo, Bengasi, Tripoli, Ghadames, Tust, and the Sudan. The natives of Fezzan are of a mixed race, between those of various African countries. The principal towns are Murzuk, towards the southern boundary, and Sokna, towards the northern. Fezzan is governed by a chief, who has the title and exercises the power of a sultan within his own territory, but is dependent on the viceroy of Tripoli, to whom he pays tribute. The region is often spoken of as an oasis, but it is really a desert enclosing many oases. The population has been variously estimated at from 50,000 to 150,000.

Ffestiniog, Wales. See FESTINIOG.

Fiji (fee'jee) or Viti (vee'tee) Islands, a group in the South Pacific Ocean, forming a British colony, E. of the New Hebrides, lying in greater part between lat. 15° 30' and 19° 30' S. and lon. 177° E. and 178° W. The entire group comprises altogether 225 reef-bound islands, islets, and rocks, 80 of which are inhabited. Land area (including Rotumah), 8045 sq. m. There are numerous spacious outlets or passages to and from the central space enclosed by the group and known as the Koro Sea. Only two of the islands are of large size, namely, Viti-Levu or Naviti-Levu, the largest, whose area is more than half of that of the entire group, and Vanna-Levu or Vuya. Among the others may be mentioned Kandavu, Ovalau, Angau, Tavuni, and Karo. Most of the remainder are mere islets. The Fijis are of volcanic origin, but there are no signs of recent volcanic activity, except possibly in the presence of hot springs. The peaks are usually basaltic cones or needles, some of which rise to the height of several thousand feet, and are covered with a luxuriant foliage. The soil is extremely productive. Fruits of various kinds abound, including the bread-fruit, banana, cocconut, shaddock, papawapple, Tahiti chestnut, and a number of other types peculiar to the islands. The chief food of the inhabitants is the yam. Sugar-cane, cotton, turmeric, and tobacco are also cultivated. Sandalwood, for which these islands were formerly noted, has now wholly disappeared. Beche-de-mer (holothurian), cotton, mother-of-pearl, and cocconut oil are leading exports. The climate is agreeable and healthful, the extremes of temperature being about 90° and 62°. The annual rainfall is about 110 inches. Malarial fevers are uncommon. The natives are of a Malayan-Polynesian stock. Prior to the introduction of Christianity they were a barbarous and savage race, remarkable for cruelty, deceit, and cowardice, and addicted to human sacrifices and cannibalism; but nearly all have been Christianized by the labors of Wesleyan missionaries. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643; in 1874 they passed under the sway of Great Britain. Capital, Suva. Pop. in 1901, 117,870, of whom 2447 were Europeans. The islands are administered by a governor.

Finland (Finnish, Suomi or Suomenmaa,—i.e., "land of lakes"; L. Fin'nia, Fino'nia, Finlan'dia), a country of Europe, forming the northwestern corner of the empire of Russia, whose sovereign is grand-duke of Finland. It extends from lat.  $59^{\circ} 48'$  to  $70^{\circ} 6'$  N. and from lon.  $20^{\circ} 29'$  to  $32^{\circ} 47'$  E. It is bounded N. by Norway, W. by Sweden and the Gulf of Bothnia, and S. by the Gulf of Finland. Length, from N. to S., 700 miles; breadth, near the centre, only 112 miles, but towards the S., where it is greatest, 370 miles. Area, about 144,000 sq. m. It includes a large part of Russian Lapland. The coast generally presents a face of bold and precipitous granite cliffs and is lined by numberless small islands and rocks, which make the navigation extremely dangerous. At the entrance to the Gulf of Bothnia are the Åland Islands. The interior is a vast table-land, with an average height of from 400 to 600 feet above the sea. It is not, however, by any means a monotonous flat. The surface is much broken by hills and valleys and in the N. rises into mountains, which attain an elevation of somewhat more than 4000 ft. Many of the heights are bare, but the greater part of those of moderate elevation are covered with forests, chiefly of pine and fir, and, in combination with the vast number of lakes enclosed by their bases, often form very romantic scenery. These sheets of water, both by their number and individual extent, constitute one of the most characteristic features of the country, of whose surface they comprise about one-tenth. Among the most important are the Saima, Piijänne, and Kalla, in the S., where a great part of the surface is occupied by water; the Uleä, near the centre; and the Enare, in the extreme N., discharging into the Arctic Ocean. Lake Ladoga indents the S.E. corner of Finland. The lakes of Finland form the basins that receive the greater part of the streams. Their waters are afterwards discharged into the sea by rivers generally of no great length, but very wide and deep. There are vast areas of swamp. The climate varies much according to locality. In Lapland, in the N., it is polar, but somewhat tempered. Farther S. the winter begins in the middle of October and continues to the middle of May; but even during the coldest season thaws of several days' duration are not infrequent. Spring appears suddenly and continues for about a month. The summer months are hot and dry. The soil is fertile. The principal crops are rye, oats, and potatoes. A great part of the land, owing to the nature of the surface and climate, is fit only for pasture. Large numbers of cattle and sheep are reared and much butter is exported. In the N., where vegetation is almost confined to the growth of moss and lichen, other domestic animals are superseded by the reindeer, of which great herds are kept. The forests, which cover half the country, are exploited on a large scale and, in addition to timber, pitch, and resin, yield great quantities of wood-pulp for the Finnish paper-mills. Hunting is an important industry. Iron, copper, and tin are mined and some gold is obtained by washing in the extreme N. A great number of quarries of excellent granite have been opened, chiefly on the borders of the lakes or sea-coasts, and from them blocks of extraordinary magnitude and beauty are obtained. There are about 1700 miles of railway. The merchant marine numbers over 2000 vessels. The population of Finland in 1891 was 2,380,140; in 1901, 2,744,952. The bulk of the inhabitants consist of Finns, a people of Ugric (Uralo-Altaic) stock. One-seventh of the people speak Swedish. The Russians still number but a few thousand. All but 2 per cent. of the inhabitants are Protestants. Illiteracy is almost unknown in Finland. At the head of the educational institutions is the University of Helsingfors. Female education receives great attention. Up to the twelfth century the Finns were pagans. In the course of that century and the next the country was conquered by the Swedes. In 1721 the part of Finland which forms the province of Viborg was secured to Peter the Great by the treaty of Nystad. The bulk of the country was conquered from the Swedes by Alexander I. in 1808-9. The grand-duchy of Finland forms a separate division of the Russian empire, and until the last few years preserved its old constitution. Its autonomy has been in a great measure abolished by the recent acts of the Russian government. A governor-general, representing the emperor, resides in Helsingfors, the capital. He is at the head of an imperial senate, which is the executive body in the government. Four estates have been represented in the national legislature,—nobles, clergy, burghers, and peasants. Administratively, Finland is subdivided into 8 läns or provinces. The largest town after Helsingfors is Åbo.

Finland, Gulf of, an arm of the Baltic Sea, on its E. side, and intersected by lat.  $60^{\circ}$  N. Length, about 260 miles; width, 25-80 miles. It lies between Finland on the N. and the governments of St. Petersburg and Rethonia on the S. It receives many minor waters from the N. and the Narova, as the principal stream, on the S. The Saima Canal connects it with a chain of lakes in Finland. The chief towns situated on its shores are Helsingfors and Viborg, in Finland, and St. Petersburg (at its E. extremity) and Revel, in Russia proper. The fortress of Kronstadt is situated near the E. end. Greatest depth is about 550 feet. At Baltic Port, near the SW. entrance, the gulf is open for navigation for about 320 days in the year; at Helsingfors, for about 220 days.

Flanders, flân'ders (L. Flan'dria; Sp. Flandes; It. Fiandra; Fr. Flandre; Ger. Flandern; Flem. Vlaenderen; Dutch, Vlaanderen), a former country or district of Europe, now included in the Netherlands, Belgium, and France. It stretched along the North Sea from the Scheldt to the entrance of the Strait of Dover. The name occurs for the first time in the seventh century. The erection of the territory into a county, a fief of France, took place in the ninth century. Flanders was united with Burgundy in 1384 and with Spain (along with the rest of the Netherlands) in 1516. A portion was conquered by Louis XIV. of France, 1667-78. The Spanish Netherlands passed to Austria in 1713-14 and ultimately became the kingdom of Belgium. (See BELGIUM.) French Flanders is now included mainly in the department of Nord. The Dutch possess the most northerly portion of Flanders, which is included in the province of Zealand. The remainder, the great bulk of old Flanders, still retains its ancient name and forms the provinces of East and West Flanders, in Belgium, the capitals of which are respectively Ghent and Bruges. At the close of the Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation Flanders was one of the chief seats of trade, manufacture, and art in Europe. In historical writing the name is often applied loosely in a broad sense to designate a more extensive portion of the Netherlands. The Flemish language is spoken by about half of the inhabitants of Belgium.—Adj. FLEM'ISH; inhab. FLEM'ING. (The French of both is FLANDRAIS, flâm'dôz'.) See EAST FLANDERS and WEST FLANDERS.

Floradale, a post-village of Adams co., Pa., about 40 miles SW. of Harrisburg. Pop. about 125.

Floradale, a post-village of Waterloo co., Ontario. The banking point is Elmira. Pop. about 250.

Florahome, a post-village of Putnam co., Fla., on the Georgia Southern and Florida R.

Floral, a post-station of Cowley co., Kan., about 10 miles NE. of Winfield.

Floral, a post-village of Covington co., Ala. The banking point is Geneva or Andalusia. Pop. about 300.

Floral City, a post-village of Citrus co., Fla., on the Plant System. The banking point is Ocala or Tampa.

Floral College, a post-village of Robeson co., N.C., on the Atlantic Coast Line. The banking point is Laurinburg. Pop. 150.

Floral Park, a post-village of Nassau co., N.Y., on the Long Island R., 15 miles E. of Brooklyn. The banking point is Jamaica. Flower-culture is an important industry. Pop. about 500.

Floraville, a post-village of St. Clair co., Ill., 12 miles SSW. of Belleville.

Floravista, a post-hamlet of San Juan co., N.Mex.

Floreana (or Charles) Island, one of the Galápagos group, and the residence of the governor.

Florence (It. Firenze, fe-rén'sá; Fr. Florence, flo-rón's; Ger. Florens, flo-rén'ts; anc. Floren'tia), a city of Tuscany, Italy, 143 miles NNW. of Rome and 50 miles ENE. of Leghorn. Lat. (observatory) 43° 45' 14" N.; lon. 11° 15' 21" E. It is charmingly situated at the foot of the Apennines, on the river Arno. The river divides it into two unequal parts (the larger being on the N. side), and is crossed by six bridges, the most famous of which are the Ponte della Santa Trinità and the Ponte Vecchio, the latter, which is lined with goldsmith-shops, affording a passage-way between the Pitti and Uffizi palaces. The Ponte Vecchio was built in its present form by Taddeo Gaddi in 1362. On either side of the Arno is a spacious quay, called the Lung' Arno ("along the Arno"), a favorite lounge or promenade of the Florentines. The site of the old walls, the gates of which have been preserved, has been converted into spacious streets and promenades, the broad Viale encircling the town on the right bank. The older streets are generally narrow, but well paved with flagstones. Many of the private dwellings are handsome, and the palaces, of which there are a great many (Strozzi, Rucellai, Riccardi, the old palace of the Medici, etc.), are noble and impressive structures. Many of these are magnificently fitted up and contain extensive libraries and valuable collections of paintings. Such are the world-famous palaces and art-treasures of the Pitti and Uffizi, with masterpieces by the greatest artists in painting and sculpture. The latter structure, erected by Vasari in 1560-1574, also contains the national library, with 500,000 volumes, and some of the richest treasures of literature to be found anywhere. The city contains numerous piazzas or squares, the most important of which, and the centre of public life, is the Piazza della Signoria, having on two sides the Palazzo Vecchio, formerly the seat of the Signoria and now the town-hall, and the magnificent open-vaulted hall known as the Loggia dei Lanzi, erected in 1376. In this square Savonarola was burned at the stake in 1498.

The most striking building in Florence, and perhaps the most remarkable of its kind in Europe, is the Duomo, or cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore (begun in 1298), situated in a spacious square, nearly in the centre of the city. It is a stupendous edifice, with a dome, the largest in the world, executed by Filippo Brunelleschi in the first half of the fifteenth century. Its façade was not completed till the seventeenth century. The building is 555 feet in length; with the dome, inclusive of the lantern, 352 ft. in height. Its magnificent campanile, begun by Giotto in 1334, rises to 292 ft. Opposite the gates of the cathedral is the small octagonal church of St. John (San Giovanni), now used as a general baptistery for the city and known as the Battistero, the three bronze gates of which, one by Andrea Pisano and the other two by Lorenzo Ghiberti, are celebrated as the most beautiful castings extant. Near by is the cathedral museum opened in 1891. Few of the other churches, the number of which is said to be 170, exhibit any remarkable architectural excellence, though in many instances their internal decorations are imposing. The most noted of these are the churches of Santa Croce, frequently styled the "Pantheon of Florence," and containing the remains of Michelangelo, Alfieri, Machiavelli, and others; San Lorenzo, with the sacristy, containing the famous Medici monuments by Michelangelo; and Santa Maria Novella. The three market-places, the Mercato Vecchio, Mercato Centrale, and the Mercato Nuovo, are deserving of notice; the gallery (loggia) of the latter was built by Cosmo I., from designs by Tasso. These markets are at times supplied with a profusion of the most gorgeous flowers. Immediately behind and extending SW. from the Palazzo Pitti are the Boboli Gardens, about 1½ miles in circumference. In the western part of the city, on the banks of the Arno, is the beautiful public park called the Cascine.

Among the other buildings and institutions of the city are the Bargello, now fitted up as the national museum; the museum or monastery of San Marco, the Laurentian

Library, the Marcœllian Library, academy of fine arts, museum of natural sciences, archaeological museum, Royal Institute (with philosophical, scientific, and medical faculties), etc. The Laurentian Library, a long and lofty gallery, contains about 10,000 ancient MSS., equalled in importance by no collection except that of the Vatican. There are other libraries with large and excellent collections. The Accademia della Crusca, founded towards the close of the sixteenth century, is one of the most celebrated learned bodies in the world. The charitable institutions of the city are many and important, and some of them are of very ancient date, that of the Misericordia existing for nearly 600 years. Literary and educational establishments are numerous.

The manufactures of Florence have greatly fallen off, but silk-worms are still reared to a considerable extent, and woollens, silk, straw hats, porcelain, mosaics, glass, and pietra dura are manufactured, as also numerous objects in the fine arts (sculptures in marble, alabaster, etc.); but the chief dependence of the city is on the visits and temporary residence of foreigners. The character of the climate (mean temperature of January, about 40°; of July, 78°—extreme, 103°), which is in general fine, though somewhat foggy in autumn, the cheapness and abundance of provisions, and the beauty of the city itself, as well as that of its delightful vicinity, studded with villas, country-houses, and gardens, render Florence one of the most attractive places of residence in Italy. Among the most charming spots in the outskirts of the city are the church and cemetery of San Miniato and Fiesole. Florence is an archbishop's see.

Florence holds a conspicuous place in the history of modern Italy. It owes its origin to a colony of Roman soldiers sent thither by Octavianus (Augustus), to whom he allotted part of the territory of the colony of Fiesole, established about forty years before by Sulla. As early as the fourth century a bishop of Florence attended a council at Rome. In the twelfth century the city became a republic. It had by this time risen into importance through the industry of its inhabitants, who had commercial establishments in the Levant, France, and other parts of Europe, and had become money-changers, money-lenders, jewellers, and goldsmiths. The city occupies the foremost place in the history of the Renaissance. In the fourteenth century Dante, Giotto, Petrarch, and Boccaccio shed lustre upon it. In the first half of the sixteenth century Florentine art culminated in Michelangelo. Towards the end of the fourteenth century the wealthy family of the Albizzi became chief rulers in Florence. These again were overthrown in 1434, from which time the power of the illustrious family of the Medici was supreme in the republic. Under them Florence rose to extraordinary splendor. In 1569 the Florentine dominions were erected into the grand-duchy of Tuscany. Florence was the capital of Tuscany until 1860 and the capital of Italy from 1865 to 1871. Pop. in 1901, 304,960.

Florence, a fertile and well-cultivated province of Italy, in Tuscany, traversed by the Apennines and the Arno. Area, about 2250 sq. m. Capital, Florence. Pop. in 1901, 937,786.

Florence, a county in the NE. part of South Carolina. Area, 630 sq. m. It is bounded on the E. by the navigable Pedee River and is intersected by the Lynch River and other streams. Capital, Florence. Pop. in 1890, 25,027; in 1900, 23,474.

Florence, a city, capital of Lauderdale co., Ala., on the north bank of the Tennessee River (here crossed by a railroad and passenger bridge), at the head of steamboat navigation and at the lower end of the Muscle Shoals, about 70 miles W. of Huntsville. It is on the Louisville and Nashville and the Southern Rr. The city is in a coal and iron region and has extensive manufactures of iron, cotton, cotton-seed oil, fertilisers, wagons, etc. It is the seat of a state normal college and of the Synodical Female College. Pop. in 1890, 6012; in 1900, 6478.

Florence, a post-village, capital of Pinal co., Ariz., on the Gila River, 235 miles from its mouth and 75 miles NNW. of Tucson, its banking point. It has a smelting-furnace, etc. Here is an ancient ruin called Casa Grande. Pop. about 1500.

Florence, a post-hamlet of Drew co., Ark., 13 miles N. by E. of Monticello.

Florence, a post-village of Los Angeles co., Cal., 6 miles S. of the city of Los Angeles. Pop. about 200.

Florence, a banking city of Fremont co., Colo., on the Arkansas River, 8 miles E. of Oñion City, on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, the Denver and Rio Grande and the Florence and Cripple Creek Rr. It has gold-reduction and oil-works, etc. Pop. in 1900, 3728.

Florence, a post-village of Stewart co., Ga., on the Chattahoochee River, about 32 miles S. of Columbus. Pop. about 200.

Florence, a post-village of Idaho co., Idaho, is about 160 miles N. of Boise City, near the Salmon River Mountains, at an elevation of 11,100 feet. Gold has been found here.

Florence, a post-hamlet of Pike co., Ill., on the Illinois River, 24 miles WSW. of Jacksonville.

Florence, a post-village of Switzerland co., Ind., on the Ohio River, 60 miles below Cincinnati. Pop. about 250.

Florence, a banking city of Marion co., Kan., on Cottonwood Creek and on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé R., 45 miles S. by W. of Emporia. Pop. in 1900, 1178.

Florence, a post-town of Boone co., Ky., on the Illinois Central R., 10 miles SW. of Cincinnati. Pop. in 1900, 258.

Florence, Hampshire co., Mass., is on the Mill River and on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., within the limits of the city of Northampton. It has manufactures of sewing-silk, silk underwear, furniture, tooth-brushes, silver-ware, etc.

Florence, a post-township of St. Joseph co., Mich., about 30 miles S. of Kalamazoo. Pop. in 1900, 665.

Florence, a village of Rankin co., Miss. The banking point is Jackson. Pop. about 250.

Florence, a post-hamlet of Morgan co., Mo., about 15 miles SE. of Sedalia.

Florence, a post-village of Ravalli co., Mont., on the Northern Pacific R. The banking point is Missoula. Pop. 100.

Florence, a post-village of Douglas co., Neb., on the Missouri River and on the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha R., 6 miles N. of Omaha. Pop. in 1900, 668.

Florence, a post-village in Florence township, Burlington co., N.J., on the Delaware River and on the Pennsylvania R., 6 miles SW. of Bordentown and 24 miles ENE. of Philadelphia. It has iron-works, etc. Pop. about 1500; of the township in 1900, 1955.

Florence, a post-village of Oneida co., N.Y., in Florence township (town), 36 miles NNE. of Syracuse. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1207.

Florence, a post-village of Erie co., Ohio, about 20 miles SE. of Sandusky and 6 miles from Lake Erie. Pop. about 250.

Florence, a post-town of Lane co., Oregon, at the mouth of the Siuslaw River, 51 miles W. by S. of Eugene. Pop. in 1900, 222.

Florence, a post-village of Washington co., Pa., 24 miles W. by S. of Pittsburgh. Pop. about 350.

Florence, a banking city, capital of Florence co., S.C., 102 miles N. of Charleston, on the Atlantic Coast Line. It has cotton-gins, railroad-shops, tobacco-warehouses and stemmeries, etc. Pop. in 1900, 4447.

Florence, a post-village of Williamson co., Tex., about 44 miles N. of Austin. The banking point is Georgetown. It is a shipping point for cotton and grain. Pop. about 400.

Florence, a post-village of Rutland co., Vt. The banking point is Brandon. Pop. 200.

Florence, a post-village of Snohomish co., Wash. Pop. about 60.

Florence, a banking post-village, capital of Florence co., Wis., on the Chicago and Northwestern R., 25 miles SE. of the Iron River, Mich. It has iron-mining interests and is a shipping point for ore and lumber. Pop. about 1600.

Florence, a banking post-village of Lambton co., Ontario, 38 miles SE. of Sarnia. Pop. about 450.

Florence Station, a post-village of Stephenson co., Ill., 8 miles by rail SW. of Freeport. Pop. 125.

Florence Station, a post-hamlet of McCracken co., Ky., 9 miles by rail S. of Paducah.

Florence Station, a post-hamlet of Rutherford co., Tenn., on the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis R., 26 miles SE. of Nashville. Cotton and grain are shipped here. The battle of Stone River was fought nearly 2 miles from this station, Dec. 31, 1862—Jan. 2, 1863.

Florenceville, a post-hamlet of Howard co., Iowa.

Florenceville, a post-village of Carleton co., New Brunswick, on the river St. John, 20 miles N. of Woodstock. It is on the Canadian Pacific R. The banking point is East Florenceville. Pop. about 400.

Florenceville East, New Brunswick. See EAST FLORENCEVILLE.

Florensac, fl'rdm'sak', a town of France, in Hérault, 26 miles SW. of Montpellier. Pop. about 3000.

Florentia. See FLORENCE.

Florenville, a post-village of Saint Tammany parish, La. The banking point is New Orleans. Pop. 175.

Flores, fl'rdz, Floris, or Mangarai, an island of the Malay Archipelago, and the largest of the chain that extends from Java to Timor, mostly between lat. 8° and 9° S. and lon. 119° 30' and 123° E. Length, from W. to E., about 230 miles; breadth, from 10 to 35 miles. Area, 5860 sq. m.

The surface is mountainous and on its S. side are lofty volcanic peaks (Gunong-Keo, 9060 feet; Lobetobi, 7300 feet; Gunong-Api). Cotton of good staple is raised, but the chief exports are sandal-wood, bees-wax, birds'-nests, tortoise-shell, and dyewoods. The native inhabitants are a dark curly-haired race, who also occupy many of the islands lying to the E.; on the coast are several colonies of Malays and Bugis, which latter possess the valuable port of Endé, on the S. coast. At the E. extremity of the island is Larantuka, a former Portuguese station and now the seat of the Dutch administrator, whose superior is the resident of Timor. Pop. estimated at 250,000. The Strait of Flores, on the E., separates this island from Solor and Adenara.

Flores, flo'réah, the most westerly island of the Azores. Lat. 39° 25' N.; lon. 31° 12' W. The surface is mountainous, but fertile; shores steep. Principal towns, Santa Cruz and Lagenas. Pop. about 9000.

Flores, flo'réa, a town of Guatemala, the capital of the department of Petén, on Lake Petén. Pop. in 1893, 1671.

Flores, a central department of Uruguay. Area, 1744 sq. m. It is an agricultural section and has good pasturage. Capital, Trinidad. Pop. in 1900, 15,585.

Flores, a foreign suburb of Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic.

Flores, an island of the Plata estuary, 22 miles E. of Montevideo.

Flores, flo'réa, an island in the North Pacific Ocean, off the W. coast of Vancouver Island. Lat. 49° 20' N.

Flores, flo'réah, a town of Brazil, state and 210 miles NE. of Goyas, near the Paraná River.

Flores Head, or Iron Cape, the most NE. point of Flores Island, in the Malay Archipelago.

Flores Sea, that part of the South Pacific Ocean lying N. of the island of Flores and S. of the island of Celebes, extending from N. to S. upward of three degrees of latitude. It is interspersed with numerous islets and coral reefs.

Floresville, a banking post-town, capital of Wilson co., Tex., on the San Antonio River and on the San Antonio and Aransas Pass R., 30 miles SE. of San Antonio. It is a shipping-point for cotton and live-stock. Pop. in 1900, 895.

Florenham Park, a post-borough of Morris co., N.J. Pop. in 1900, 752.

Floriana, or Floriania, flo-ré-á-ná, a suburb of La Valetta, in Malta.

Florianopolis, Brazil. See DIERZHO.

Florid, a post-village of Putnam co., Ill., 7 miles SE. of Bureau Junction.

Florida, flo-ré-da (Sp. pron. flo-ree-dá), the southeasternmost state of the American Union, consisting mainly of a peninsula, which, with the opposite peninsula of Yucatan and the intervening W. portion of the island of Cuba, forms the eastern barrier of the Gulf of Mexico, converting that body of water into the Mediterranean of the New World. The state is bounded N. by Alabama and Georgia, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by the Straits of Bimini, or Florida Strait, and the Gulf of Mexico, and W. by the Gulf of Mexico and Alabama. Area, 58,680 sq. m. Its extreme limits (including the keys) are in lat. 24° 30' and 31° N. and lon. 79° 58' and 87° 38' W.

Face of the Country.—The whole peninsula (375 miles long and 90 miles in average breadth) is low, having few hills which attain the height of 200 feet above sea-level, and with the highest point about 350 ft. (Brooksville, 328 ft.). There are innumerable lakes, of which the largest is the shallow Okeechobee in the S., about 35 miles in length and with a depth of 10-20 feet. Swamps and marshes are numerous, including the Everglades in the S., covering more than two million acres, the Kissimmee and Cypress swamps, N. of Lake Okeechobee, and the Okefinokee swamp, which is mostly in the state of Georgia but extends southward into this state for a considerable distance. Springs are abundant, and often discharge copious supplies of water, and in many cases the waters have saline and other mineral constituents which impart valuable sanative qualities. An effort to reclaim the swamp-lands in the S. by affording a direct outlet for the waters of Lake Okeechobee through the Caloosahatchie River, has not proved fully successful. There are numerous rivers, several of which (the St. Johns, Ocklawaha, Hillsboro, Caloosahatchie, Apalachicola, St. Mary's, etc.) are navigated by steamers, their courses in some instances being directed through a "swamp" or flooded forest, affording singular aspects of scenery. The Kissimmee River, which drains a considerable part of the south-centre of the peninsula, is tributary to Lake Okeechobee. The Indian River in the SE. is a long arm of the ocean, which is separated off by a discontinuous narrow sand-spit. The coast-line extends nearly 1200 miles. There are numerous bays, sounds, and lagoons, particularly along the Gulf coast; and they are generally shut in from the sea by keys and low spits composed of sand, broken coral, and shells. A few of the southern keys are covered with hard, rocky knolls. Many are grassy or clothed with a jungle of shrubs and trees which are West Indian rather than North American in character, and some of the keys have a good soil. The principal harbors and ports are Fernandina, Jacksonville on the St. Johns, St. Augustine, and Miami, on the E. coast; Key West, in the S.; Punta Rassa, Charlotte Harbor, Tampa Bay, Tampa, Cedar Keys, Apalachicola, and Pensacola, on the Gulf side.

Geology and Minerals.—The greater part of the state belongs to the Tertiary and Post-Tertiary periods, and is constructed of limestone and overlying loose sands, with marginal areas of shell-rock and coral-reefs. Reef-structures of any magnitude are found only in the Everglades tract. The principal mineral products of the state are shell and coral limestone; coquina, a useful shell-conglomerate employed as a building-material; clay suitable for making pottery and bricks; lime-phosphates, extensive deposits of which, in some places rich in mammalian and reptilian remains, are found through a large extent of the peninsula; and a peaty material which is abundant in the swamps, and "low hammocks," but is not much utilized for any industrial purpose. Bog-iron ore exists in some parts.

Animal Life.—Among the game animals are deer, a small variety of the black bear, the raccoon, and the opossum. The Florida lion (or panther) is apparently still an inhabitant of the more forested districts. Alligators abound in lakes and streams, and a true crocodile is found in Biscayne Bay. The manatee, or sea-cow, which formerly browsed in great numbers along the shores, is now not common. Wild turkeys are abundant, and water-fowl and other game birds were until recently extremely plentiful in the more remote sections of the state, where flocks of heron, spoon-bill, flamingo, ibis, and Carolina parrot were a feature in the life of the land. Among the valuable food fishes are shad, pompano, black and other bass, sheepshead, mullet, grouper, etc. The tarpon is the most sought-after among the large game fishes. The green turtle is often taken among the keys. The rattlesnake and water-moccasin, among venomous serpents, are common, and there are numerous laocertilians, of which the anolis or "Florida chameleon" is the best known. In the marshy regions insect pests are abundant. In the southern sounds the taking of sponges is an important industry. Much of the wild land is well adapted to pasturage.

Soil, Vegetation, Agriculture.—All qualities of soil are found, from the pine barrens, which produce little besides lumber and forest products, to the fertile hammock lands, some of which are as productive as any soil in the world. When ditched and drained, the swamp lands are often very valuable. Next in value are the "low hammock" lands, which are highly prized and very prolific. "High hammock" lands are less durable and require more fertilizing than the lower ones. The natural vegetation of Florida is very rich, and the state is capable of affording abundant supplies of timber and forest products. The long-leaved pine, the excellent (evergreen) live-oak, juniper (or red cedar), hickory, and other timbers are extensively sawn and exported. Among the rare trees is the Torreya, or stinking yew; and in the extreme S. grow the mahogany, the deadly manchineel, Jamaica kino, cashibou gum-tree, satin-wood, lignum-vita, Indian almond tree, cocoanut, canella, and other trees which are seen nowhere else in the United States. Several species of palm-tree are found in the state. The Zamia integrifolia, a cycad, grows in the SE. abundantly, and from its root a starch called Florida arrowroot has been produced. The swamp-tracts are largely overgrown with the cypress (Taxodium), with which are associated the evergreen-oak and (in the south) the parasitic or climbing fig (rubber). Low growths of mangrove cover many of the outlying islands along the coast and in the harbors. Of cotton, both the long and the short staple kinds are grown. Sugar-cane is chiefly raised along the Gulf coast. Indian-corn and rice are the principal cereals, and the latter grain is well adapted to the climate and soils of Florida. An important and lucrative industry is the cultivation of early garden vegetables for the northern markets. The vine grows here to perfection, and some attention has been given to the manufacture of wine. A great deal of capital has been profitably invested in the planting of orange-groves, the oranges of Florida being of excellent quality. Figs, limes, lemons, guavas, pomegranates, olives, and other subtropical fruits do finely in the larger portion of the state. In the S. are grown pineapples, bananas, etc. Tobacco is largely grown. The rearing of neat cattle is a very important occupation in the S. and W. The total area of land under cultivation in 1900 was somewhat over 1,000,000 acres. The value and production of the principal crops in 1900 were: cotton, valued at $2,318,690; corn, 4,654,774 bushels; peanuts, 1,219,223 bushels; sweet potatoes, 2,268,788 bushels; sugar-cane (equalling 66,000 barrels of syrup), $546,913; tobacco, 969,384 pounds; oranges, 334,466 boxes; and pineapples, 187,800 crates. The orange and pineapple product has very largely increased since 1900.

The climate is singularly equable; the state lies so far S. that it only exceptionally experiences severe cold, and its summer heat is tempered and modified by the seas on either hand. A winter temperature of 17° has been recorded at Tampa. The maximum temperature is about 104°, and the average for the year at Jacksonville is 69°; at Key West, 77°. Notwithstanding the copious rainfall, there are occasional severe droughts. Many thousands yearly make Florida a winter-resort; and large numbers of consumptives and other invalids have found the climate of the dry pine regions very beneficial. Malarial and remittent fevers prevail in some sections, and yellow fever is an occasional visitant of the seaports.

Manufactures, etc.—The manufacture of pine lumber, spars, live-oak ship-timber, and naval-stores (rosin, tar, oil of turpentine, etc.), the tanning and preparation of sponges for market, and the cigar-manufacture (of which Key West is the seat), are all industries of importance. The value of the tobacco production was, in 1900, $10,891,286. Pensacola is now the principal seat of the lumber-trade. The lumber- and timber-products for the year 1900 were valued at $10,848,403; the manufactures of tar and turpentine at $7,794,101. In 1889 the production of phosphate was about 450,000 tons; in 1903 its value was $2,986,824. The fisheries employ some capital, chiefly in the south. Salt is made by solar evaporation, and cotton-seed oil and oil-cake are made and exported. Alligator skins are prepared for the manufacture of boots and shoes quite largely. Palmetto hats and braids are important articles of domestic manufacture.

Railroads.—The railroad facilities of Florida have increased in recent years to a remarkable degree, and now give easy communication with the greater part of the state. The length of running lines was, in 1900, 3295 miles.

Education.—The public institutions for higher education are the State Agricultural College at Lake City, the East Florida Seminary at Gainesville, the Florida State College at Tallahassee, a state normal school at De Funiak Springs, and the State Normal and Industrial College at Tallahassee. There are numerous private and denominational institutions of various grades (several of them for the higher education of negroes). Among the most important are Rollins College at Winter Park (Congregational), the John B. Stetson University at De Land (Baptist), the Florida Conference College at Southerland, and the Florida Baptist College and Cookman Institute (for colored) at Jacksonville.

Counties and Towns.—There are 45 counties, namely, Alachua, Baker, Bradford, Brevard, Calhoun, Citrus, Clay, Columbia, Dade, De Soto, Duval, Escambia, Franklin, Gadsden, Hamilton, Hernando, Hillsboro, Holmes, Jackson, Jefferson, Lafayette, Lake, Lee, Leon, Levy, Liberty, Madison, Manatee, Marion, Monroe, Nassau, Orange, Osceola, Pasco, Polk, Putnam, Saint John, Santa Rosa, Sumter, Suwanee, Taylor, Volusia, Wakulla, Walton, and Washington. Among the important towns are Tallahassee, the capital (pop. in 1900, 2981); Key West (17,114); Jacksonville (28,429); Pensacola, the seat of a United States navy-yard (17,747); Tampa (15,839); St. Augustine (4272); Fernandina (3245); Miami, Palatka, Orlando, Lake City, and Ocala.

Government.—The constitution now in force was adopted in 1868. The governor is chosen for a term of four years, as are the state senators, 32 in number; while the 68 members of the assembly are elected for two years. Judges are appointed and elected for a term of six years. Florida sends 3 members to the United States house of representatives.

History.—Florida was discovered in 1513 by Juan Ponce de Leon, who gave the region its name because he landed there on Easter Sunday (Sp. Pascua Florida). The name was by the Spanish writers of that day given to a great territory lying to the N. and W. also. In 1521 Ponce de Leon embarked upon the conquest of Florida, but the expedition ended in disaster and he died of a wound. In 1539 Hernando de Soto marched through the region. The permanent settlement dates from 1565, when the Spaniards founded the town of St. Augustine. Spain held possession of Florida until the Peace of Paris in 1763, which conveyed it to England. England was forced to restore it to Spain in 1783. The region was divided into East and West Florida, the Apalachicola River being the dividing line. West Florida (as claimed by Spain) extended to the Mississippi River. Part of West Florida (ceded by Spain to France) passed to the United States in the Louisiana purchase of 1803, and in 1812-13 the United States took possession of the part between the Pearl and Perdido rivers.

In 1819 the United States concluded a treaty with Spain for the cession of Florida, and in 1821 the transfer was made. In 1822 the territorial government was organized. In 1835 began the terrible war with the Seminole Indians, whose remnants in 1846 were for the most part induced to remove to the Indian Territory. The state was admitted to the Union in 1845. Florida passed an ordinance of secession in 1861. The state was not re-admitted to representation in Congress until 1868.
